Canadian students visit Jedwabne

By ELI RUBENSTEIN
Special to The CJN

JEDWABNE, Poland — "The greatest insult to the dead is to lie about the manner of their deaths."

These were the words spoken by Rabbi Reuben Poupko of Montreal during a moving ceremony held recently in Jedwabne, Poland. He was addressing 130 Montreal students participating in the 2001 March of the Living to Poland and Israel. The students had gathered in Jedwabne to honour the memory of the 1,600 Jewish citizens of that town who were murdered by their Polish neighbours under the watchful eyes of German soldiers in July 1941.

This was the first Jewish group to visit the site since it became common knowledge that the massacre had been carried out by local Polish citizenry. Previously, the killings were blamed on the Nazis, as the recently removed stone monument on the site of the massacre stated.

"We pay tribute to the current Polish government – the president and the prime minister – and the archbishop, who have recognized the truth of their deaths and acknowledged the crime committed by Polish citizens. They have removed the old monument that blamed the Nazis and will replace it with a new one with the correct historical information, in a ceremony in

El Al restructures Canadian operations

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Canadian office of El Al Israel Airlines appears to have dodged a bullet as the airline announced a dramatic restructuring plan that will see it drop several unprofitable North American and European routes.

Departures from Toronto could actually increase under the restructuring arrangement, as Toronto takes on a new role as a transit point for Israel-bound passengers flying from Los Angeles.

Flights would no longer originate in Toronto but Canadians should see their choices increase to five weekly non-stop flights to Israel year round, said Stanley Morais, sales and marketing manager for El Al in Canada.

Currently, El Al flies from Toronto three times a week in the winter and adds two flights in the busier summer season. The proposed changes are expected to be in place in November or shortly thereafter, Morais said.

El Al's recovery plan comes in response to major losses it expects to report in its 2001 income statement. El Al lost $110 million (US) in 2000 and is expected to lose the same amount in 2001. The airline posted a profit of $16 million in 1999.

Last week, El Al CEO David Hermesh outlined plans to cut back the airline's operations by 20 percent. The plan includes the sale of aircraft, staff reductions and the discontinuation of unprofitable routes. Although Hermesh would not indicate which routes were being dropped, the Israeli business press speculated they would include

Canada

Manley to Israel

OTTAWA — Foreign Affairs Minister John Manley is scheduled to visit Israel next week as part of a swing through the Mideast. Manley is slated to go to Egypt, Jordan, the Palestinian autonomous regions and Israel from May 6 to 14. He is slated to be in Israel May 13, where a meeting with his Israeli counterpart, Shimon Peres, is on the agenda. Last Friday, the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) met Manley, and said it was impressed with his "growing understanding" of the issues. The CIC said it placed "special emphasis" on the minister's need to "enhance his understanding" of security issues facing Israel.

Video Hoax

VERNON, B.C. — A video denying the Holocaust was sent to teachers here last month, along with a fake letter saying it was from B'nai Brith Canada, asking that the film be shown on Yom Hashoah. The packages appeared to have come from the Calgary office of B'nai Brith. A teacher was alarmed by the video and contacted authorities. B'nai Brith called the episode a "vicious hoax," and is working with the RCMP on the case.

Bloomfield Charged

MONTREAL — A prominent member of Montreal's Jewish community has pleaded not guilty to charges he helped orchestrate an international stock fraud based in London and New York. Harry Bloomfield, a lawyer and philanthropist, turned himself over to authorities in New York last week, and was released on bail after entering his plea. Bloomfield, 56, is charged with conspiracy, possession of forged documents and falsifying business records. Four others also accused in the scheme have already pleaded guilty.

Agunot Awareness

OTTAWA — Beth Shalom West Congregation is planning an agunot awareness weekend for May 12 and 13 featuring Mattie Klein, founder of the New York-based L'Maan B'nos Yisrael International, which is dedicated to helping the plight of agunot; and Rabbi Shmuel Gamliel, director of the agunah department of Israel's rabbinical courts. Rabbi Howard Finkelstein, spiritual leader of the congregation, said the purpose of the Shabbaton is to give the community a legal, social and religious understanding of the plight of agunot.

Hebrew in the House

OTTAWA — Prof. Irwin Cotler, Liberal MP for Mount Royal, had the following to say last week in the House of Commons on the occasion of Yom Ha'azmaut: "Mr. Speaker, today we commemorate the 53rd anniversary of the establishment of the State of Israel, which comes one week after we commemorated the 56th anniversary of the Holocaust…

"In a word, Israel, at its core, is the embodiment of Jewish survival and self-determination – the reconstitution of an ancient people in its ancestral and aboriginal homeland.

"Mr. Speaker, may I conclude with the age-old Hebrew prayer for peace:

"Oseh shalom bimromav, Hu yaaseh shalom aleinu v'al kol Yisrael, v'imeru, amen:
May God Who establishes peace on High, grant peace for us all, amen.

"May this 53rd Anniversary herald the end of violence, the protection of human security, and a real, just and lasting peace for all the peoples of the Middle East."

Israel

Wagner Concert

JERUSALEM — The Simon Wiesenthal Centre has petitioned Israel's Supreme Court to block any financial support for a planned July concert that will include works by German composer Richard Wagner. The performance of works by the "arch anti-Semite" will be "an affront to the victims of the Holocaust," the centre said.

Jewish Population

JERUSALEM — Israel's 5.2 million Jews comprise 38 percent of the world's Jewish population, according to the Hebrew University's Institute for Contemporary Jewry. And the Central Bureau of Statistics released its annual population figures last week showing that Israel has 6.2 million residents. Last year, the population grew by 152,000. Every day in 2000, 360 new babies and 150 new immigrants arrived. Sabras are now 64 percent of the Jewish population, almost twice the level of 1948.

World

Gays Object

WASHINGTON — North America's largest organization for Jewish lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgendered youth has issued an open letter challenging the mayor of Regina's proclamation of Heterosexual Family Pride Day for June 18. In a letter to Mayor Pat Fiacco, Bernard Cherkasov, executive director of the National Union of Jewish LGBT Students, called for respect for diversity.

DUBLIN — Erlich's, The last kosher butcher shop serving Dublin's 1,100 Jews is about to close. The development came after Erlich's lease ran out.

CJC Announces Award Winners

OTTAWA — The Canadian Jewish Congress has confirmed the award winners at the 26th CJC plenary assembly at Inn on the Park in Toronto on May 6 and 7.

Edgar Bronfman will receive the Saul Hayes Human Rights Award for his leadership of World Jewish Congress and the World Jewish Restitution Organization, and for his efforts on behalf of Holocaust survivors and Jews around the world. The presentation will be made Monday, May 7 at the closing luncheon in the Centennial Ballroom.

Prof. Irving Abella, one of Canada's most distinguished writers, scholars and community leaders, will receive the Samuel Bronfman Medal for his service as a past president of CJC, chair of its war crimes committee and in many other capacities. The presentation will be made on Sunday evening May 6 at the gala dinner in the Centennial Ballroom.

Two young leaders from Quebec, David Shapiro and Stefani Balinski, will be this year's recipients of the Brian A. Finestone Memorial Award and the Monroe Abbey Award, respectively.

Special Report

Reading, writing and stress management

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Schools today are facing rising stress levels – and it's not only the kids who are bringing the tension into the classroom.

From personal problems to ongoing tensions around strikes and cutbacks, some teachers may find themselves overwhelmed before they even begin a teaching day, said Beth Feffer of Jewish Family & Child Service.

"Most teachers are dedicated to their profession – they really do want the best for their students," Feffer said. "But they sometimes don't know how to deal with certain situations."

In the last few years, teachers have had to cope with a heightened level of pressure stemming from such things as the amalgamation of school boards and the introduction of new curricula. These changes may have an impact on the morale and ability of a teacher to reach a room full of children in the most productive way.

"Experiencing stress is part of every job," said Peter Ferguson, who is a 35-year veteran teacher and vice-principal from the public school system.

But Ferguson notes the stress has taken a toll on many teachers. "Teachers are leaving the profession in droves. Why?" Ferguson asked.

"On one hand, there can be individual reasons for stress in teachers' lives – divorce, family break ups, economic hardships."

There are also changing social trends in families which have to be dealt with, he said. And at the same time, testings and standards by which to measure students are being imposed, without taking into account the whole picture of the child.

"When you test how kids are doing in school, you aren't just testing the school, you are testing the community and the family where the child came from.

"You are testing previous years of education," Ferguson said. "And yet, the pressure will all land on the teacher whose class is being tested."

"Often, teachers may find themselves ill equipped to deal with the emotional and psycho-social issues that come into the classroom," Feffer said.

"What worked for a teacher last year may not work this year," Ferguson said.

For whatever the reason, when inappropriate teaching techniques are applied, there can be varying effects on the children, said Otto Weininger, a psychologist and professor of educational theory at OISE at the University of Toronto.

Some children may respond to a teacher's behaviour by beginning to feel that school is just a waste of time, Weininger said. Other children may change their behaviour in a way that may seem inappropriate – but really is appropriate for that child's age group.

"It is then up to teachers to realize that something is going on in the environment – an environment that they control – that has to change.

"Unfortunately, in many cases, we're not teaching teachers this way. We're giving them didactic lectures, we're giving them textbooks to read, but we seem to be oblivious of the fact that these things that they're teaching are human beings, they're not little rocks."

Weininger believes teachers should not be judged solely on their ability to complete a curriculum.

"It is unfair to both the teachers and the children when they're not given other forms of training," Weininger said.

"There are some teachers who have a great deal of difficulty handling their frustrations and anger, or the threat of being accused of not being good teachers, or of being criticized," Ferguson said.

And in today's world, teachers do face continuous cynicism and criticism in their public and private lives, as parents become unsettled by continuous strikes and job actions.

"Teachers often feel that no matter what they say, they aren't going to be understood, that there's not going to be any understanding of some of the difficulties they're dealing with, that they are not valued and that they are essentially failures," Ferguson said.

When all this piles up, it is important for the principal and vice-principal to recognize signs of problems that may emerge in classrooms.

We are Israel's defenders

Two items in the news last week reinforced the absurdity and, alas, the sadness surrounding Israel's plight in the Middle East, and indeed, in the West as well.

In Tehran, representatives from more than 30 Muslim countries, including representatives from the Palestine Authority, met for two days to reaffirm their rejection of the Jewish State, although few, if any of the attendees would deign to pronounce the name Israel. They still prefer to use the coded epithet "Zionist entity."

The gathering was a kind of celebration of hatred, with each speaker ratcheting slightly higher than the previous, the level of animosity and vitriol toward the Jewish State.

Ha'aretz reported that the leader of Lebanon's Hezbollah guerrillas, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, "warned Israel to expect surprise attacks from Palestinian extremists."

The warning won applause from the assembly, which included Khaled Meshal, a leader of the Hamas movement, the target of the failed assassination attempt by the Mossad in Jordan two years ago, and Abdullah Ramadan Shalah, head of the Palestinian Islamic Jihad.

Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, Ha'aretz reported, opened the conference by declaring "combat, not dialogue, was the language Israel understood."

"Supporting the Palestinian people is one of our important Islamic duties," Khamenei said. He also offered the opinion that Zionists had exaggerated the Holocaust to justify crimes against the Palestinians.

"There are documents at hand that show... that the numbers of the Jewish Holocaust were exaggerated to solicit international sympathy and lay the grounds for the occupation of Palestine and justify the atrocities of the Zionists."

Iran's President Mohammad Khatami, referred to by commentators and journalists in the West as a moderate, also weighed in against Israel.

"The oppressed people of Palestine, whether those who dwell in that bloodstained holy land or those who continue to bear the brunt of hardship and displacement worldwide, are all the victims of Zionist discrimination and aggression," Khatami said.

In the same issue of Ha'aretz another article began, "Israel is facing the possibility of punitive measures from the European Union because of hardening and widening opposition to its policies towards the Palestinians.

"EU member states are now actively debating a change in their approach to Israel, the British daily The Guardian reported, with decisions expected at two key foreign ministers' meetings next month.

"In the past, Israel has been defended in the EU by traditional friends such as the Netherlands, Sweden and Britain, but it now has few defenders left."

The words left me cold and angry.

Israel "now has few defenders left."

Where have we arrived? Does truth no longer matter in the resolution of disputes?

In the same week that the tyrants, despots, dictators and military rulers of the Middle East incited themselves and their populations to further detestation of and violence against the Jewish state – and indeed, of Jews too – the representatives of the European democracies were lending the despots a form of vindication for their incitement.

The EU have simply fallen in line with the Palestinian piper, Yasser Arafat. He plays the tune and calls the shots.

How absurd that the EU could find the moral resolve to condemn Israel but not the various tyrannies attending the Tehran conference who took such obvious and effervescent delight in pronouncing death and destruction upon Israel!

Far more poignant and precious than the fact that Israel is the only democracy in the Middle East is the undeniable fact that Israel is the only Jewish State anywhere on this planet.

Israel's defenders will arise from those people on earth who seek true peace and justice in the Middle East. Last week, on Yom Ha'atzmaut, Prof. Gil Troy of McGill University published the following words. We must all follow his example.

"On this Israel Independence Day, Jews should reaffirm their faith and pride in Zionism, while the world should marvel at its achievements. Zionists must not allow their enemies to define and slander the movement. No nationalism is pure, no movement is perfect, no state ideal, but today Zionism remains legitimate, inspiring, relevant, to me and to most Jews. A century ago, Zionism revived pride in the label 'Jew'; today, Jews must revive pride in the label 'Zionist.'

"I am a Zionist because I am an idealist, and just as a century ago, the notion of a strong, independent, viable, sovereign Jewish state was an impossible dream – yet absolutely worth fighting for – so, too, today, the notion of a strong, independent, viable, sovereign Jewish state living in true peace and harmony with its neighbors appears to be an impossible dream – yet absolutely worth striving for.

"I am a Zionist because I am a romantic, and the vision of the Jews rebuilding their homeland, reclaiming the desert, renewing themselves, was one of the greatest stories of the twentieth century, just as the vision of the Jews maintaining their homeland, reconciling with the Arab world, renewing themselves, and serving as a light to others, a model nation state, could be one of the greatest stories of the twenty-first century."

We are Israel's defenders, "few" as we may be.

JA seeks to 'connect' Diaspora, Israeli Jews

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "Connection," as in establishing links between Diaspora Jews and their Israeli counterparts, is a buzzword being bandied about these days in upper echelons of Jewish communal organizations.

"Relevance" might be another way of looking at it and "tikkun olam" (repairing the world) might be the means of achieving it.

These are exciting times for senior officials of the Jewish Agency, who are struggling to balance the traditional mandate of the organization – promoting aliyah and absorption – with its new strategic plan of fostering connections among world Jewry.

Ilan Rubin, the Toronto-born secretary-general of the Jewish Agency, believes the creation of a world Jewish "peace corps" might be just the ticket to broaden the agency's relevance to young people who are seeking an outlet for their idealism. Breaking the cycle of poverty in Israel, particularly among 70,000 Ethiopian olim, might be another.

The peace corps, Rubin envisions, would bring together Jews from the Diaspora and Israel to work on humanitarian projects in the Third World, in Israel and wherever Jewish communities are at risk. The volunteers would help revitalize these communities, while creating new connections.

"We could have an explosion of Jewish creativity," he predicted. "What the Jewish Agency is looking to get out of it would be to increase the bonds between Jews in Israel and Jews abroad."

Helping Ethiopian Jews could be another program with Jewish Agency input, Rubin said. The Agency envisions a US $600 million investment over five years in poverty relief. The funding would be evenly divided between Diaspora communities and the government of Israel, and would focus on education, training and a social component to help Ethiopian Jews overcome the technological deficit they experienced coming from an agrarian society.

"This is something that's groundbreaking in world terms," he said.

Rubin, who was in Toronto recently on a family visit, pointed out that the Jewish Agency adopted a new strategic plan in June 2000 that is designed to reposition the organization to address world Jewry's contemporary concerns.

The Jewish Agency is changing from its historic role as a "quasi-governmental organization…to become a catalyst, facilitator, enabler – an organization that makes alliances with other groups," Rubin said.

The strategic plan "identified the most important need of the Jewish people today as connection," he said. "In a world in which Israel and Jews in the Diaspora are increasingly in danger of mutual indifference, the Jewish Agency sees one of its major goals as strengthening the connection and revitalizing that bridge – looking for all sorts of people to people partnerships."

Despite the shift to new areas of concern, the Jewish Agency's primary function remains aliyah and absorption. More than 70 percent of its US $350 million annual budget is allocated to that task.

But even as the Jewish Agency moves in new directions, Rubin, 53, has the skills to adapt to changing conditions.

He studied political science at the University of Toronto and in 1969, made aliyah along with his future wife, Cynthia Kohn, who he met at Hillel.

"I had always felt that if I had one life to live, I wanted to live it at the centre of the world. I am a Jewish patriot," he said.

In Israel, Rubin studied business administration, planning to continue in his father, Alex's, footsteps and become involved in real estate development.

An epiphany changed the direction of his career. A long time activist for Soviet Jewry, Rubin was asked to undertake a task that he still prefers to keep secret. Suffice to say, it whetted his appetite for community service.

Rubin left the private sector and secured a job with Israel's Ministry of Housing. From there, he moved to the Jewish Agency, advancing steadily through the organization's senior ranks.

Ilan Rubin, secretary-general of Jewish Agency.

His ascent was punctuated with a break at the Kennedy School of Government, where he earned an MA in public policy. In 1988, he was named deputy to the secretary general of the Jewish Agency, with responsibility for policy to the Soviet Union. In 1997, he was named secretary general, in charge of relations with the Agency's governing institutions, its executive, board of governors, committees and its annual assembly.

TORONTO — Legal pressure has persuaded a group of controversial rabbis to stop using the name of a well-known organization for Jewish recovering alcoholics and drug addicts.

Telephone calls and a letter from an Ottawa lawyer have convinced Toronto rabbis David Cooper and Aaron Zimmerman to stop using the name JACS to tout their conversion classes.

In recent weeks, signs along Bathurst Street between Sheppard and Steeles avenues have advertised the Jewish Adoption & Conversion School (JACS), and a telephone number.

The conversion classes take place at a storefront synagogue, Beth Meyer Congregation, located in a strip mall at 848 Sheppard Ave. W.

But JACS is also the name of Jewish Alcoholics, Chemically Dependent Persons and Significant Others, a highly successful self-help group that has attracted hundreds of recovering Jewish addicts since it was set up in Toronto last year.

It also maintains JACS Place at 858 Sheppard West, just a few feet from the congregation. Since opening last summer, JACS Place has been attracting hundreds of newcomers who hear about 12-step programs for Jewish addicts.

Officials with the self-help group feared there would be confusion with the other JACS, especially since the two are so close to each other. But the rabbis countered they were using the name long before the other group came to town.

However, the rabbis backed down last week after calls and a letter from Ottawa lawyer Chuck Rotenberg.

"I don't have a whole arsenal of lawyers who have nothing better to do than to defend my small service here," Rabbi Cooper told The CJN. "I want to spend my time teaching Torah.

Sign for Jewish Adoption & Conversion School.

"I didn't realize it would tick them off that much, but obviously it has."

He said his choices for a new name for his service are either JAC (Jewish Adoption & Conversion) or HACS (Hebrew Adoption & Conversion School). The latter, he said, "is probably the more religious or traditional term for my type of work."

Both names will be submitted to JACS for approval.

Rotenberg declined to reveal the contents of his letter to the rabbis. It "suggested a way to solve this," he said.

The name of the self-help group is registered in the United States, where JACS was founded, but not in Canada, Rotenberg conceded. However, a name may be legally protected through usage, which entitles it to trademark rights, he explained.

JACS "will probably" register its name in Canada soon, he added.

Rabbi Cooper said he began calling his classes JACS in the fall of 1999. "We were here first. If they didn't object to it last year, why are they objecting this year?"

Neither Rabbi Cooper nor Rabbi Zimmerman belong to the Vaad Harabanim or the Toronto Board of Rabbis. Rabbi Cooper said he, Rabbi Zimmerman and others are members of the "Association of Independent Rabbis." He said they perform about two dozen conversions a year.

They also offer bar mitzvah lessons and marriage preparation classes. A sign outside the congregation says, "Marriage chapel, all faiths."

The term "adoption" in the group's name does not mean it is associated with the adoption of children, he said.

"Some of the rabbis perform inter-marriages, and the non-Jewish partner may not go through with a conversion process. So in fact, they are adopting Judaism."

Asked why he and his colleagues perform conversions that are not recognized as valid by the overwhelming majority of rabbis in the city, Rabbi Cooper said, "I welcome it. I don't want [them] recognized by the Orthodox establishment."

Told that his conversions are considered suspect by other rabbis too, he said, "That is something I make perfectly clear to all people who come to me, and I tell them that when they want to become Jewish, this is perhaps one step of the way toward their inclusion into a Jewish way of living."

For those who "can't take on [the] huge step" of converting through the established religious movements, "this is like a half-step, and I won't turn them away."

The community's rampart

Our ancient sage Rabbi Shimon well understood the utter indispensability of community for Jewish survival when he told his colleagues that "the community is Israel's rampart." Throughout the ages of Jewish life, community has been the sustaining framework enabling families to pass on traditions and values from parents to children.

Throughout the modern age of Canada, it is no overstatement to point out that the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) has been a rampart for the Jews of Canada. From its founding in 1919, through the rescue work of the dark period of World War II, the social activism that followed that war and the political activism that followed the Six Day War, CJC has been part of the deep sinew of Jewish peoplehood, resilience and resolve binding Canadian Jews from one coast to the other and representing our community to legislators, decision-makers and the public at large.

Over the past two decades, however, as the Jewish community in Canada has grown and affiliations have evolved into a rich diversity of interests and choice, that sinew has been made even stronger by the maturing of the local federation system and the addition of other voices to the sometimes harmonic, sometimes cacophonic, communal chorus. The CJC has had to change, even as the times and our community have changed.

On May 6 and 7, in Toronto, many of those changes will be on display and others will be debated as the CJC holds its 26th Plenary Assembly.

President-designate Keith Landy has indicated one of the new, changing directions for CJC. "As time moves on... I believe CJC should be moving towards an agenda with the main purpose of advocacy on social issues," Landy told The CJN last week.

As Landy wisely implies, it is imperative that CJC respond to the pressing needs of the day. Those needs are not fewer than yesteryear; they are simply different. The recent protests in Quebec City are perhaps both a foreshadowing and an expression of some of those needs.

Sixty years ago, when the public's needs arose from vastly more sinister circumstances, A.M. Klein wrote that Congress must help Canadian Jews "live up to the urgencies of the hour."

That is still the role of Congress today. "Canadian Jewry must play the part which both its Canadianism and its Judaism demand," Klein wrote. It falls to the CJC, therefore, as one of Canadian Jewry's important and influential agencies, to fashion an instrument from the double forge of our Canadianism and our Judaism, both of which share core fundamental values: human dignity, equality, respect for law and freedom. What an instrument that could be, wielded in justice and only for good – for the peoples of Canada and the world!

Israel must not submit to bullies

I am writing to voice my support of Israel at this critical time when the Palestinians are resorting to violence and treachery to attain what they could not attain peacefully at the negotiating table. I am 94 years old. I have written 70 letters to the media in Israel's support. This is my 71st letter and I hope I will not have cause to write again.

Many people blame Israel for the intifadah. Why don't they condemn the Palestinians who send their young children with slingshots against Israeli soldiers? Predictably, the Israeli Defence Forces do only what they are supposed to do: defend the State. Meanwhile, the Palestinians continue to feed their children a steady diet of hate propaganda against Israel and the Jews. It's amazing that the UN casts a blind eye on Yasser Arafat and his terrorist attacks. If the Palestinians would only desist from violence, they would continue to be free to work in Israel.

Tragically, some 20,000 Israeli soldiers have fallen in armed combat since 1948. I have immense respect and gratitude for the IDF soldiers who risk their lives to defend the State. By doing so, they also defend the Jewish people all over the world.

When I see what is happening now, when I read the lives lost through terrorism, my heart breaks. I feel compelled to show my solidarity. I do so knowing that some of my previous letters have led anti-Semites to pester me and my late wife Terry with hateful phone messages morning, noon and night, for more than a year. It is a sign of how much Terry believed in the importance of standing up to bullies that she insisted we would not change our telephone number as the police recommended.

Israel must not give in to bullies. The Jewish State deserves our support.

Reader bugged

At the risk of being accused of wanting the last word and that lawyers always try for that, Canadian Alliance Party's communications director, Ezra Levant's description of me as a gadfly and a gnat (in recent CJN and Globe and Mail articles) confirms my belief that his party and all those associated with it bug me.

Spiritual Passover in Israel

Further to Bruce Elman's article "Sharing History, Sharing Destiny" (CJN, April 19), I would like to inform your readers of the following.

On April 3, my wife, daughter, 2½-year-old granddaughter and I flew to Israel for Passover.

We travelled throughout the country by car, which I drove, and we had a wonderful time, enjoying every minute of our stay. We met Torontonians in Tiberias and Jerusalem who told us that they and their families were also having great vacations.

Despite higher airfare costs to Israel than to Florida, in total, it was less expensive to spend the Passover holiday in the finest hotels in Israel than in Florida, and certainly spiritually far more rewarding.

At no time did we feel either afraid or threatened.

We hope to return to Israel soon, and hope that your readers will travel there in the near future.

Readers should face truth

Re: Letters to the editor (CJN, April 26): Sadly, it seems that while even the most left-leaning peacenik in Israel has come to realize that we can no longer turn a blind eye to the incitement and the indoctrination of anti-Semitism that takes place under the auspices of the Palestinian Authority, some of us in North America would prefer to be politically correct than to face the truth about the conflict in the Middle East.

The fact of the matter is that while Israelis still mourn their dead with tears and Kaddish, Palestinians continue to mourn their dead in riotous mobs, uttering racial slurs and death threats to Israel and burning Israeli and American flags and firing shots into the air.

I only hope that the readers of The CJN can find the moral courage to face the truth of the situation rather than to oppose any attempt at honestly showing what is going on in our homeland.

Western, Mideast values are different

Contrary to what those readers whose letters were published in The CJN April 29 believe, the Israelis and the Palestinians do not share common values and cultures. It is a problem that many in the Western world, and many Jews, impose their own values upon others in the Mideast. That is why they cannot understand the situation there clearly and are blind to the key issues.

Palestinians do not mourn in the same way that Israelis do. The Kfar Saba suicide bomber's mother said she was "pleased" with her son's actions, and believes that all Palestinian youth must follow in his path. The Mufti of Jerusalem, Sheik Ikrima Sabir, emphasizes the importance of martyrdom. Some Palestinian mothers say their martyred sons have brought great honour to their families. Some even go so far as to say that they bear their sons precisely for this purpose!

Prayers answered in exciting Leafs victory

I remember this confrontation as if it were yesterday. In fact, it took place 23 years ago. The Paikin family needed to have a serious summit which, at the time, seemed every bit as momentous as anything Richard Nixon and Leonid Brezhnev could have pulled together.

Steve Paikin

The issue wasn't nuclear deterrence. It was more important than that. Would two teenagers from Hamilton be allowed to attend a National Hockey League Stanley Cup playoff game between the heavily favoured New York Islanders and the Toronto Maple Leafs?

The teenagers had done their research and they knew going to the game would be a tough sell. Tickets would be expensive and hard to get. It was a "school night," and by the time the game and the return trip to Hamilton were over, it would likely be past midnight.

And there was another problem. It was Passover. We had to have our seder. We always did. Of course, there had never been a conflict like this to worry about in past years. The Leafs were always terrible. Playoffs? During our formative years as Leaf fans, the team never made the playoffs, so it wasn't something we ever had to worry about.

But 1978 was different. The team was led by its dynamic captain, Darryl Sittler. Lanny McDonald and his big bushy moustache were regularly popping in goals from the right wing. Borje Salming, who blazed a trail from Sweden to the NHL, and Ian Turnbull, anchored the defence. Tiger Williams gave the team grit. And Mike Palmateer was a goaltender of unprecedented flamboyance between the pipes.

My brother Jeff and I loved the Leafs. Absolutely loved them. Which made attending this summit fraught with potential pitfalls. Still, we hoped for the best.

"You don't think they're going to forbid us from going to the game?" my brother asked me.

"Nah," I told him confidently. "I mean, of course, we'll just have to hold the seder early, then hit the road by 6:30 p.m. so we can get to the game on time."

What about the prohibition on seeking other forms of entertainment after the seder?

"Oh, for goodness sakes," I told him, "The Leafs are in the playoffs! They'll understand."

Jeff and I attended the summit, cautiously optimistic that a reasonable solution could be found. But we made a classic negotiating mistake. We underestimated our opponents' unwillingness to compromise.

"I know you guys very much want to go to the game," our mother Marnie, the summit chair, argued. "But we're not just Leaf fans in this family. We're also Jews, who need to remember that, if not for the miracles of thousands of years ago, we'd all still be slaves."

"I agree," I said, trying to stay calm. "But the beauty of this situation is that we can do both. Do the seder, then go to the game."

"It's not going to happen," she said. "As much as we all want to go to the game, it's just not appropriate on the night of a seder."

My brother and I started to go ballistic. (Maybe we needed some of those Nixon-Brezhnev negotiators alongside after all). "What's not appropriate is to abandon our team when they need us most," I said, feeling ever more desperate and prepared to try any line, no matter how far-fetched it sounded.

"Sorry, guys," my mother said firmly and finally. "It's just not going to happen." Talking to Marnie was obviously futile. Then we noticed our father Larry hadn't said anything to this point. Maybe the united parental front wasn't so united after all? We tried to exploit this possibility.

Unfortunately, we discovered his silence didn't mean that he agreed with us. It meant he was trying to avoid being the target of our profanity. Some things are better left to the mother, right?

We never did get to the game that seder night. The only compromise our parents made was to allow us to watch some of it on television after the seder was over. Shortly thereafter, my brother and I came to understand that our parents made the only decision they could have made.

The series turned out magnificently for the Leafs. They staged one of the great upsets in playoff history. Our family watched it on TV and literally jumped for joy when Lanny McDonald potted the winner in overtime of Game 7.

It was something for which the Paikin boys prayed very hard. Could it be those prayers went answered because of our devoted observance in holding that seder?

There's no doubt about it.

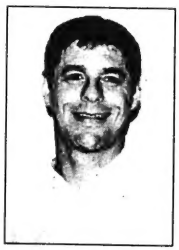
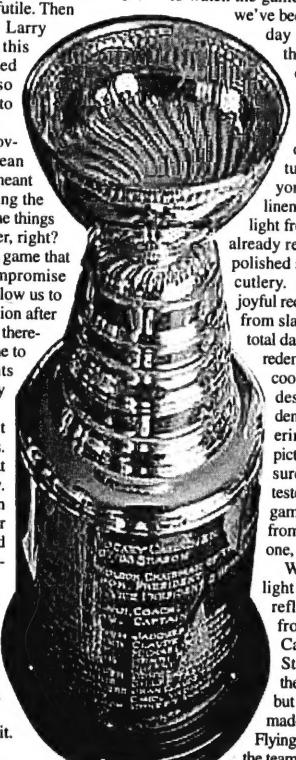
Greatest Habs 'Cup' win a real miracle

As a lifelong Canadiens fan, I've often been asked, "What was the best Canadiens' playoff series ever?" As a Jewish Canadiens fan, I usually discuss it with my family at the Passover seder table, around playoff time, when we discuss some other important questions as well. Sometimes we mix the questions together. And as so often happens, we answer a question with another one.



Andrew Fainer

For example, for me to say which is the best Canadiens' playoff, I have to start with a more basic question: Why did we Montreal Jews, with 3,000 years of beginning the Passover seder with just four questions, add this fifth one from the 1950s onward: "On this night, which is different from all other nights, are we going to watch the game – which is something we've been doing every Wednesday and Saturday night for the last six months but is different now because it's the playoffs and really important?"



Consider that Mom's dining room was a sanctuary, entered only on yontif. The starched white linen tablecloth reflected the light from the glass chandelier already reflecting off the highly polished silver candlesticks and cutlery. So, why, after Dad's joyful recitation of how we went from slavery to freedom, from total darkness to God's light of redemption and my mother's cooking, would we want to descend into a darkened den to watch a small, flickering black and white picture tube – even if it was sure to be a fiercely contested Stanley Cup playoff game? Who chooses to go from light to darkness? No one, which is my point.

We wanted to have the light from the Stanley Cup reflect off us. Given that from 1956 to 1979 the Canadiens won the Stanley Cup 15 times, there'd be light reflecting, but how so upon us? What made the Canadiens, "The Flying Frenchmen," our team, the team for Montreal Jews? To answer, let me offer a simple story.

In 1969, I was in Grade 7 and was asked to join two other kids on the CBC show Tween Set to interview Jean Béliveau, captain of the Canadiens since 1961, winners of four Cups in the last five years. I was too excited to think of what to ask – don't worry, my good Jewish family gave me questions. (Should helmets be mandatory? Was college hockey rather than junior hockey an option?)

After weeks of anticipation, the taping was over all too quickly. But as I was about to leave the studio, I saw the show's starry-eyed producer, also Jewish, chatting with my hero. I ignored the good manners taught to me about interrupting adults and sidled over to talk to him some more. The producer finally realized it was more appropriate to let the kid be the fan and I had him all to myself. I can still feel the cramp in my neck from looking straight up at someone so tall, so close up, for so long. If it wasn't for a blushing mom, who had stayed at a distance until a half hour had passed, saying, "I'm sure Mr. Béliveau has other things he has to do now," he'd have talked to me until training camp.

"What did you ask him? What did you talk about?" Mom asked.

"I didn't ask him anything. He just kept asking me questions!"

Imagine such a true gentleman like him leading the Canadiens for over a decade – that's why they were our team too.

So the best playoff ever for our team? I asked the Montrealers around the seder table that question (almost a full week before the playoffs started). Amazingly, there was no argument. It was the time we went from the greatest darkness to the greatest light – the 1971 Cup, and coincidentally the last of Jean Béliveau's 20 seasons.

The previous year, we had not even made the playoffs. We ended the 1970-71 season 24 points behind the Big Bad Bruins of Orr, Esposito and Cheevers. Ken Dryden, who had played only six regular season games, stood them on their head as we defeated them in seven games. We won a tough series against Minnesota. Then, in the seventh game of the finals against Chicago, we came from behind in the second period to win, with goals from Henri Richard, who had been in the coach's doghouse earlier in the series. You see, when we asked at the start of the playoffs what would it take to win – we had all replied, "a miracle."

And is this not what seders are about? How could we ever beat those Egyptians? It took a miracle. Ten miracles, actually. Still, there are questions. If it took ten miracles in Egypt, how many at the Red Sea… and how many for the Canadiens to make the playoffs next year?

Remembering Nordhausen

A few weeks ago, I received in the mail a photocopy of an old German newspaper, probably from the 1850s. It was sent to me by a namesake in California, who was attracted by the headline which read, "Jacob and Moritz Plaut: Honorary Citizens of the City of Nordhausen."

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

I read the article with great interest because that city holds a special place in my memory. It was on April 12, 1945 when our U.S. army division arrived there.

That day I wrote to my wife, "This afternoon I saw a sight that I won't forget as long as I live. Nearby was a German concentration camp [Dora] – for Russians, Poles, Jews and political unreliables. When our first American troops came, there were about 4,000 dead lying around and 400 scarcely alive – if 'alive' they could be called. Death for the others had come mostly through starvation, a fearful sight indeed. Our troops were out in numbers staring at the incredible scene. There were many who for the first time in their lives were convinced – because they couldn't help seeing what they saw – that what they had heard about the Germans wasn't all propaganda."

I did not know then that Dora-Nordhausen was the first concentration camp to be liberated. In the scale of camps it was a "minor" installation – except for those who perished there. For me, it produced a shock of major proportions, because the reality was far more inhuman and ghastly than I had imagined. Nordhausen breached my protective shell as nothing else had done.

With our arrival at the camp, the entire sentiment of our division changed. It was one thing to see displaced persons crowding the road, but the sight of Nordhausen was something altogether different. There we were confronted by the true nature of Nazism – and that without even seeing the ovens of Auschwitz.

A day or so later, General Dwight D. Eisenhower arrived. He looked briefly at the sight, shook his head and said, "I would not have believed it." Apparently, Dora-Nordhausen was his first acquaintance with what the Nazis had done.

Now the above-noted newspaper copy informed me that 100 years before, two Plauts had donated huge amounts of money to the city and that they represented the continuation of 600 years of honourable presence in Nordhausen. But in 1945, all that was forgotten. The memory of the honorary citizens of Jewish birth was erased along with the lives of so many others of their co-religionists.

Nordhausen was my first physical contact with the Holocaust, and what I saw there shaped my mind and outlook forever after.

A festering sore

Last week, two of the police officers involved in the "October events" last year were promoted by Uzi Landau, minister of internal security. His action went unnoticed by most Israelis. Those who were aware of the move have found it difficult to make any comment while the headlines rage with news of violent confrontations with the Palestinians and terrorist attacks on innocent civilians.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

But perhaps this is all the more reason to take note of the Orr Commission and its deliberations, which are presently underway. First, some clarification: The "October events" refer to the killing of a dozen Israeli Arab citizens by Israeli police during violent demonstrations last fall. The Orr Commission is the national commission of inquiry set up by then-prime minister Ehud Barak to review the background of the events and their bloody conclusion.

Barak's initial inclination had been to appoint a simple committee of inquiry. Subsequent public pressure forced him to elevate its status to that of a national commission of inquiry. While not formally binding, the recommendations of such commissions have always been accepted by the government of the day. In fact, this was one of the reasons for Barak's reluctance to appoint the commission in the first place.

Even in their early stage, the Orr Commission's deliberations have already reflected the problematic, polarized nature of Jewish-Arab relations inside Israel. The Arab community has unrealistic, excessive expectations, and is unlikely to accept anything short of unequivocal condemnation of the conduct of the police involved. The police have already criticized the process because it raises questions about their policy and practice. And the violent outbursts by families of the victims during the meetings have further poisoned an already charged atmosphere.

To the surprise of the police, the Arab community was well organized and prepared for the hearings. Adala, the leading Arab human rights organization, collected victim and witness testimonies that have been used by the commission. A sophisticated communications strategy was used to brief the media. The result was favourable press commentary from the start.

The history of similar commissions is instructive. In 1993, the Agranat Commission inquiry into the intelligence failure preceding the Yom Kippur War was given a limited mandate to investigate only the professional military echelon. Subsequent public pressure forced the ultimate resignation of prime minister Golda Meir, demonstrating that the impact of a commission can go beyond its actual findings.

The Landau Commission inquiry into torture of security prisoners resulted in permission for limited physical pressure in cases where national security was at stake. This provision was later struck down by the Israeli Supreme Court in a ruling that rendered Landau's provision illegal, thereby effectively negating its impact.

The Kahan Commission inquiry into the Sabra and Shatila massacres in 1982 resulted in the resignation of then-minister of defence Ariel Sharon, but its broader impact on the public debate following the controversial Lebanon War had far-reaching implications.

The Orr Commission was conceived in pressure and confrontation, rather than as an attempt to reconcile the two sides to the conflict. For the most part, the Israeli Jewish public is less sensitive to the situation of Israel's Arab minority as a result of last October's violence.

Furthermore, recent public opinion polls show a hardening of attitudes towards Israeli Arabs throughout the latest Palestinian intifadah, demonstrating once again that Israelis make little distinction between Arabs on either side of the Green Line. There is little likelihood of significant public pressure to encourage the government to act as a result of any recommendations made by the commission.

It isn't always easy to draw the line between freedom of expression and public order. Israeli Arab violence last October required a tough response.

But the police apparently responded with a double standard that came naturally to them. By now, it seems clear that they were woefully unprepared for the nature of the demonstrations, and unskilled in the use of alternative measures to suppress the violent crowds. They used live bullets virtually indiscriminately, killing 12 demonstrators in the process. The Orr Commission may tell that like it was, but it will likely highlight – rather than resolve – the deep-seated tension between the two communities.

Jewish identity is a slippery concept. It's hard to define, and even harder to measure. This is certainly true for the current generation of young Jews, particularly those in the United States.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

Identity is not the same thing as behaviour. There are many behaviours that we associate with being Jewish, and that we assume are an expression of Jewish identity. The more of these any Jews carry out, the greater their Jewish identity. Studying these sorts of bahaviours means that any researcher does not have to delve deeply into the meaning and attitudes these Jews hold about being Jewish.

Observing Shabbat and Jewish holidays, keeping kosher, attending synagogue, belonging to Jewish organizations, having Jewish friends, dating and marrying Jews, attending Jewish schools or summer camps, sending one's children to Jewish schools or summer camps, visiting or worrying about Israel, contributing to Jewish charities, reading Jewish books or enjoying Jewish cultural creations – all these are "the usual suspects" used to measure degrees of Jewishness.

But are these measures still as valid as they once were? I confess I have what sociologists call a behaviourist bias – that is, I prefer to measure actions rather than attitudes as indicators of identity. But of late, I have become more open to alternate views.

Imagine people who declare themselves to be very athletic, but never exercise or play sports. At one level, we can and should dismiss their claim. But at another level, we might want to explore their claim more deeply, trying to understand what it means for them, and why they feel obliged to make it.

In other words, behaviours are not the only indicators of people's identities. Some people define behaviours differently. Moreover, we should not always expect behaviours to be consistent. And certainly, behaviours and attitudes can differ.

Recently, I have been exploring some of these issues with a small sample of American Jewish students in the northeast. Because of their age, their Jewish identities, like their general identities, are in flux. But some of the older assumptions are clearly challenged, even within this group, which is made up of people with a non-Orthodox background but with above average levels of Jewish exposure and affiliation.

Keeping kosher or observing Shabbat, for example, means many things for this group. Indeed, these students have their own personal recipe for Jewish life. This includes those who are in fact involved with conventional Jewish life, some seeking to build careers in Jewish communal service.

Many feel very Jewish but will date non-Jews. Most prefer to marry a Jew. Ironically, many in this group were reluctant to consider marrying a non-Jew who would convert to Judaism. At the same time, a handful said they would not rule out marrying a non-Jew, while maintaining a meaningful Jewish identity.

Some report a wavering in the degree of their support for, or personal bond with, Israel. Except for a few baalei tshuvah, most would not consider Jewish day schools for their children even as they insisted they would build a very Jewish home on other dimensions. For many, Judaism is a search and a journey, rather than a fixed destination. Some are spiritual seekers, for whom Judaism may have some but not all of the answers. A few were wrestling with basic questions about belief in God, or about Jewish spirituality. One student noted that she found not only Jewish services rewarding, but also gospel and Islamic services. Another reported the need to withdraw from intense Jewish involvement in order to develop other interests and aspects of his personality.

This group is not a representative sample. And readers will note that examples of inconsistency are not new in Judaic thought and Jewish folklore. But it seems that now, these non-linear forms of Jewishness are more the rule than the exception.

The Jews I studied all identify strongly and positively as Jews, and will do so in the future. But their type of Jewishness will be more difficult to categorize. Simple religious categories like Conservative, Reform, Reconstructionist, and even looser terms like traditional, conservadox, secular, will continue to lose their usefulness. Over time, others will emerge to take their place.

The Kirshner File

Nobel Prize laureate Saul Bellow is clearly a formidable force in American literature, having written such masterful novels as Herzog, The Adventures of Augie March, Mr. Sammler's Planet and Humboldt's Gift.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Despite his fame, Bellow has proven to be an elusive figure insofar as his actual life is concerned. James Atlas, a New York writer, has come along to fill in the gaps with a monumental biography that leaves little room for further speculation.

Bellow (Random House), weighing in at a hefty 636 pages, takes the story from Bellow's birth in Montreal to the publication of his latest novel, Ravelstein, which Atlas describes as "a startling achievement, the most compelling book Bellow has written in years."

Bellow, it should be said right at the outset, does not fall under the category of hagiography. Although Atlas admires the man, he gives readers a balanced portrait.

We learn that Bellow was guided by the belief that he was destined to be a novelist; that his father, a merchant from Russia, was contemptuous of his son's literary ambition; that his manuscripts were regularly rejected by journals before he finally hit paydirt; that Time magazine, in its infinite wisdom, turned him down for a writing job; that he was still struggling to make ends meet in his mid-40s; that Herzog made him rich; and that he identifies with the fate of the Jews, even though he has always insisted he is not strictly a "Jewish" novelist.

Bellow's father, Abraham Belo of the Pale of Settlement, was an importer of Turkish figs and Egyptian onions and once a rabbinical student in Lithuania. In 1913, he brought his family to Canada, where his sister Rose and her husband had settled. Thanks to a Halifax customs official's haphazard transliteration of his surname, Belo became Bellow.

Two years after their arrival in the Montreal working-class suburb of Lachine, Abraham Bellow's wife, Lescha (Liza), gave birth to her fourth child, Solomon, first known as Shloime and later as Saul. In 1918, the Bellows moved to Saint Dominique Street, in the heart of Montreal's Jewish ghetto. But being unable to make a steady living, he joined his brother – a baker – in Chicago in 1924.

This is where Saul Bellow honed his talents and where he became a natural storyteller, pouring his imagination into stories, poems and essays. In his bones, Bellow felt he would be a writer. Abraham Bellow, now a coal merchant, was not impressed by his flights of fancy. "You write, and then you erase," he said derisively. "You call that a profession?"

Bellow, nevertheless, persisted. In 1938, after graduating from Northwestern University, he applied for an editorial job in the Hearst publishing empire. His interviewer summarily informed him he had no aptitude for writing. Thus dismissed, he landed a part-time post at a local teachers college teaching anthropology and English composition.

In the meantime, he submitted stories to national magazines that they rejected. But in 1941, Partisan Review published his first story, Two Morning Monologues, which Atlas claims were "competent if undistinguished."

At the height of World War II, Bellow applied for a staff writing job at Time. The editor in charge of personnel wanted to hire him, but Whittaker Chambers, who edited the arts pages, did not take a yen to him.

While he was waiting to be called up for military service, Bellow wrote his first published novel, Dangling Man, which appeared in 1944. Edmund Wilson, the critic, praised it as "well written and never dull." The novel did not improve his hand-to-mouth financial situation, however. What sustained him, he wrote years later, was "my painful freedom to think and feel."

Bellow, who has had five wives, was immensely attractive to women. Indeed, he was a philanderer whose infidelities were renowned. But since he had "a detestation for solitude," Bellow could not resist marriage. His fifth wife, Janis Friedman of Toronto, is 44 years his junior.

The Victim, his second published novel, was a mild critical success but a commercial flop, having sold 2,257 copies, only about 700 more than Dangling Man. As he approached 40, Bellow, with a wife and a child to support, depended on freelance writing assignments, teaching jobs at universities and handouts from his two brothers in the real estate business.

Having measured himself against modern giants like Sherwood Anderson and D.H. Lawrence, he finally found his form in 1953 with The Adventures of Augie March, which made him famous. Observes Atlas: "The struggle to achieve a more natural idiom required innumerable false starts and discarded manuscripts."

But even as Augie catapulted him to stardom, Bellow wallowed in insolvency. "He's not getting rich on writing, that's evident," noted a Ford Foundation official who examined his grant application. Bellow's inability to achieve fiscal stability, though painful, did not dampen his exuberance for the craft, says Atlas.

In 1962, Bellow was offered a five-year contract to teach at the University of Chicago, and he accepted with alacrity. It was to be his "intellectual shelter" for almost three decades.

Herzog, published in 1964 to rave reviews, spent 42 weeks on the bestseller list and sold 142,000 copies in hardcover. The paperback rights were bought for the then astonishing sum of $371,000, making Bellow relatively wealthy.

Mr. Sammler's Planet (1970) garnered a mixed reception, but it elevated Bellow's reputation beyond the realm of literature. One critic gushed that he was "a cultural frame of reference," and Esquire included him in its feature, The 100 Most Important People in the World Today.

By this juncture, Bellow was widely considered a pivotal figure on the Jewish American scene. Yet the appellation did not appeal to him. Bellow, striving for universality, did not want to be identified solely as a Jewish writer. "We had no sooner arrived and begun publishing books – first [Bernard] Malamud and I, later on [Philip] Roth – than we were tagged as Jewish writers," Bellow mused. "We thought of ourselves as belonging to the mainstream. We were Americans of Jewish origin."

In Atlas' view, there was "an element of snobbery" in his reluctance to affiliate himself with Jewish writers. And yet, as he quickly adds, Bellow's work is profoundly rooted in his identity as a Jew. As he puts it: "His characters... were unmistakably Jewish in their sensibilities and the intonations of their speech. The moral complexity of his style, its introspective heroes, and its vernacular language belong to the storytelling tradition that goes back to the Haggadah."

Bellow's identification with Jews was such that on the eve of the 1967 Six Day War, when Israel seemed besieged by the Arab world, he offered his services as a correspondent to a number of magazines. Newsday accepted, and off he went to Israel.

In closing, Atlas recounts a conversation with Bellow he had as he was finishing this biography. "When I remarked... what an interesting life he'd had, he responded dryly, 'I'm glad I haven't lived in vain.'"

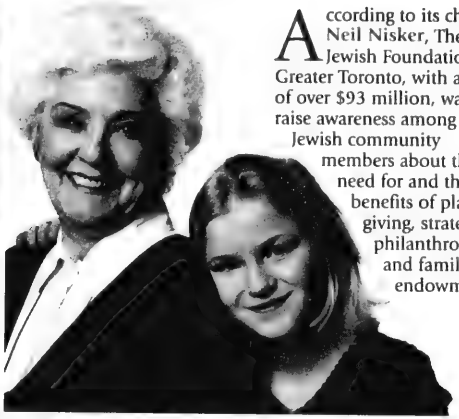
The Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto

THE FUTURE IN YOUR HANDS...

There's an exciting new Foundation in town and it's accompanied by nearly $100 million. The newly named Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto is UJA FEDERATION's Bequest and Endowment Fund.

UJA FEDERATION

A FOUNDATION FOR OUR FUTURE



According to its chair, Neil Nisker, The Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, with assets of over $93 million, wants to raise awareness among Jewish community members about the need for and the benefits of planned giving, strategic philanthropy and family endowments.

"We are in the early stages of the most significant inter-generational transfer of wealth ever witnessed," Nisker stressed. "Now it's in our hands to set an example for our children by investing in our Jewish future through the Jewish Foundation."

Nisker sees the Jewish Foundation as "the gate-keeper of our community's financial future," with a mandate to think creatively about "how to address the challenges imposed by an increasingly complex global economy and shrinking government support. "

The Foundation, he hopes, will convince thousands of contributors to leave a personal legacy – a gift for future generations. "A gift from your assets when you die – a planned gift – will enable your continued support forever," says Nisker. "Planned giving is about matching an individual donor's estate planning and tax objectives with his or her unique philanthropic interests. Through planned giving and endowments, a UJA legacy gift offers many ways to preserve all the values we wish to pass on."

Taking experience to new heights

Carol Kassel, the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto's recently appointed director, is no stranger to UJA FEDERATION. A dedicated lay leader for many years and, now a vital member of Federation's professional staff, Carol is bringing her expertise and compassion into a new challenge.

"Ours is an enviably dedicated and thriving Jewish community" Kassel notes, "and to ensure a strong and vibrant future, we urge donors to consider leaving a legacy for generations to come." A gift to The Jewish Foundation is an opportunity to continue what you've helped to build throughout your lifetime.

Community Architect and Guardian

This June, after 15 years of devoted community service, Sam Helfenbaum will be stepping down as Director of UJA FEDERATION's Bequest and Endowment Fund. Under his caring direction, the Fund flourished, becoming deservedly recognized as Canada's foremost Jewish Foundation.

"My career wasn't just fundraising," Helfenbaum explains. "Working with Bequest and Endowment contributors makes us enablers. We facilitate dreams and act as agents to make a difference and sustain our future, helping donors recognize they are divinely assigned stewards of assets provided for sharing."

Have the results been rewarding? Absolutely. "If I could pass along an observation from what I have seen and learned, it would be a reminder that no one has ever become impoverished by sharing. The dividends are immeasurable, all appetites are satisfied and the long-term yields bring us that much closer to fulfilling tikkun olam (healing the world)."

ALL IN THE FAMILY

The Family Philanthropy Forum is yet another expression of how UJA FEDERATION is working to make tzedakah an inclusive, family affair. Chaired by Michael Shulman and operating under the auspices of The Jewish Foundation, The Forum is an educational resource, dedicated to providing Toronto's leading charitable families with information on today's most effective and forward thinking philanthropic practices.

On May 22nd 2001, The Forum will hold its second program, featuring guest lecturer Lee Meyerhoff Hendler who will be dealing with issues of wealth transfer. The topic: An Intergenerational Conversation on Family Philanthropy, followed by discussion and working groups on the Do's and Don'ts of Intergenerational Philanthropy. For more information, contact Maxine Bessin at 416-631-5827.

For more than a decade and a half, the Update Seminar, sponsored by UJA FEDERATION, has brought together professionals from the fields of law, accounting and financial planning for intensive briefings by industry experts. This year's annual Update Seminar will be held on:

To register, please call Linda Magled at: 416-635-2883 ext. 203

WHAT YOU CAN DO

No one can predict what tomorrow will bring. But a planned gift to The Jewish Foundation guarantees that your voice in support of the Jewish community will resonate forever.

There are many financial vehicles available to facilitate your participation.

"Every generation has a responsibility to leave a legacy for the next generation and allow a new generation to build on the strengths of the previous one."

CREATING A UNIQUE LEGACY

UJA FEDERATION'S Women's Campaign & Advocacy is offering a powerful opportunity for community women to create a unique legacy. Through a minimum $100,000 endowment, a woman will be able to endow her annual Lion of Judah commitment, joining a prestigious category of women world-wide, who demonstrate extraordinary commitment to meeting Jewish needs. "What originally inspired me about this caring concept," explained Women's Campaign & Advocacy Chair Lesley Binstock Offman, "is the underlying idea that, no matter what the Jewish community faces in the years ahead, I can make a gift during my lifetime that will be a source of support well beyond it."

"A Lion of Judah Endowment (LOJE) is a powerful statement of commitment with enormous impact on our community", says LOJE Chair Debbie Kimel. For more information about LOJE, contact Maxine Bessin at 416-631-5827.

Israel's fallen soldiers remembered at ceremony

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Among the records kept by Israel, perhaps the most significant statistic is the number of young men and women who have died defending their tiny country, said Rabbi Howard Morrison at last week's Yom Hazikaron service at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

About 19,000 Israeli soldiers have fought and died for Israel in the 53 years following the nation's establishment in 1948.

"We have fulfilled our dream of being a free people in our own land," he said. "Now we must push forward with new dreams."

"We hope there will be peace from beyond the borders, and peace from within the borders. We hope that all Israel embraces one another in a spirit of co-operation. We hope that Israel will be a light for the nations of the world and for each of us," he said.

On Sunday, Rabbi Morrison announced he and 15 colleagues from the Toronto Board of Rabbis would be flying to Israel for five days "with the hope of enhancing the bridge that connects and unites Jews in Israel with Jews in the Diaspora."

The service was run jointly by Israel's consulate and the Jewish Agency, represented respectively by Vice-Consul Zehavit Ben Hillel and Offer Isseroff, regional director of Toronto's Israel Aliyah Centre.

Meir Romem, consul general of Israel, noted that it was "the most difficult day, the saddest day of the year.

"Tonight we remember with sorrow and pride our sons and daughters who gave their lives for our independence and the survival and security of the State of Israel," he said.

The past year has been difficult, noted Romem. "The Palestinian Authority began to perform acts of terror and violence. Precious human lives were lost. We have lost our trust in the Palestinians and we doubt whether they are sincerely ready to make peace with us," he said.

Israel is a strong, democratic and peace-loving state, Romem asserted. "Israel will do its best to achieve peace."

The service also included a number of poignant songs and readings. A memorial candle was lit by Tsipi Erez, who lost a father, an uncle and her husband. Dozens more were lit on a table set up outside the sanctuary before the service.

Kaddish was chanted by Holocaust survivor David Arzem, who lost his brother, the only other surviving member of his family, in Israel's War of Independence. Other participants included Beth Emeth's Cantor Aaron Bensoussan, who sang K'El Maleh Rachamim.

Program moves from Israel's saddest to most joyous

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel has not fought six wars since its establishment as a state in 1948; it has fought one war, in which the sole objective of its enemies has been to drive Israel and its population into the sea, says Rabbi Moshe Shulman.

Rabbi Shulman, spiritual leader of Shaarei Shomayim congregation, was speaking at the annual Yom Hazikaron/ Yom Ha'Atzmaut program at the synagogue. The event was sponsored by Mizrachi Organization of Canada, Emunah Women, Bnei Akiva and Yavneh Olami.

While dealing with a situation that saw 90,000 Israel soldiers killed in battle, Rabbi Shulman said, Israel has managed to grow from a population of 600,000 to six million, while absorbing three million immigrants.

"It has managed to do what no other free nation has done – bring blacks from Africa to be freed, not to be enslaved."

He listed the paradoxes of the Jewish state – the phenomenal economic growth, while dealing at the same time with terrorism and war; the ingathering of the exiles and the difficulties in absorbing them; the glory of having a state; plus "the internal strife that shames us."

"We believe in the justice of our cause. We stand behind Israel. We affirm that support tonight," he said.

Meir Romem, consul general of Israel, said it is difficult to move from Yom Hazikaron, "the saddest day of the year," to Yom Ha'atzmaut, "the most joyous."

This has been a difficult year, he acknowledged, but Israel stands "firm, strong, and proud of its achievements."

Romem said that visiting Israel is a sign of brotherhood and solidarity with the state. "If you don't go, it means that our enemies have been successful."

The screech of an air raid siren hauntingly accompanied the moment of silence, the darkened sanctuary only adding to the emotional effect of the lone memorial candle on the bimah.

K'El Maaleh Rachamim was sung by Shaarei Shomayim assistant chazzan Shlomo Sufrin. Mordechai Mashlai, Jewish Agency shaliach to the Board of Jewish Education, read a prayer for the Israeli soldiers missing in action.

A video shown at different parts of the Yom Hazikaron service alternated pictures of war and military activities, daily life and reminiscences by former soldiers of the IDF who now live in Toronto.

The Yom Ha'atzmaut part of the evening began with a flag ceremony, called Degel, performed by girls of Bnei Akiva. Degel used to be a fixture of the event, but has not been performed for several years.

Boys and girls of Bnei Akiva presented a humorous skit portraying different Israelis all claiming to be "the typical Israeli," ranging from haredi to secular, from a kibbutznik to a city girl, from a herbalist to a hesder yeshiva boy, and from the owner of a flower shop to a Russian immigrant.

A highlight of the evening was a performance by the Netivot Hatorah Day School Choir, led by Ruth Zimberg. Marsha Kaputstin, a member of the steering committee, said that Zimberg, who has been a fixture in Jewish music education for some time, is making aliyah shortly.

The evening concluded with a special service for Yom Ha'atzmaut, the blowing of the shofar, and Hatikvah.

An innovation at this year's program was the Aura Men's Acappella Choir, comprised of Ezra Feintuch, Zevi Rosenzweig, Ilan Scolnick, Yonatan Shlagbaum and Zev Steinfeld.

Dancing and refreshments concluded the evening.

BUILDING A JEWISH TOMORROW

Jewish Life

A celebration of life

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

In this week's Torah portion, we read a small phrase that becomes central to the Jewish consciousness. In talking of a person's observance of the commandments, the Torah says, "and you should live by them." At first glance, it appears that the phrase only refers to daily practices, that is, governing life by the commandments. However, the Talmud defines this phrase as meaning the extraordinary moments in life rather than just the routine.

According to the Talmud, "you should live by them and not die by them."

In other words, the Torah is instructing us to use the commandments to frame our lives but to recognize the limitations of those commandments.

One should suspend fulfilling a commandment when the question of preserving a life is at issue. For example, one should not hold the laws of observing the Sabbath above the necessity to save a human life.

There are three exceptions to this rule. The first is the unjustified taking of a life, the second involves any sexual crime and the third is idolatry. Although it appears that these three circumstances stand outside the recognition of the importance of life, they are in fact the exceptions that prove the rule. Clearly, to unjustifiably take a life is to treat life casually and undervalue it. To engage in a sexual crime is to distort the act through which we create life, and to worship an idol is to deny God as the source of life. In other words, laying down your own life to preserve these three rules means you are sacrificing your physical existence in order to insure that the concept of life is not in jeopardy.

The beauty of this concept becomes clear when we realize that the Torah has just defined the purpose of the commandments. The rules and regulations set out in covenant are not only the Jewish frame by which we must live but they are also the skills necessary to fill that frame. The commandments must always be life affirming; they are the means through which we enrich our routines.

The goal is a positive life and we must never lose sight of that goal and become sidetracked by the means. The commandments must never be weapons that we use to attack one another and they must never gain focus as the end in themselves. All too often we meet people who are meticulous in their observance of the commandments but remain shortsighted. They do not see past the ritual frame, and are blind to the inherent value present in the people they encounter. To such a person the commandment has become opaque and is no longer a tool but an end unto itself.

As Shavuot approaches and we celebrate receiving the Torah, our text that teaches us life skills, we should pause for a moment and think of the commandments contained within the document. They are the tools that serve us we must never serve them. We must live by them and learn to use them as the mechanisms of opening windows to deeper meanings, deeper understandings.

The commandments help us celebrate life and should never become the blindfold that limits our view. The Midrash in Kohelet reminds us: "There are hypocrites of learning. It is supposed by people that they are Biblical and Talmudic scholars, but they are not. They wrap their Tallit about them and have their Tefillin on their head, but they behold the tears of the victims and they give no comfort."

Tzrifin 2001: Faces of Love

By DONIA B. CLENMAN

It has been 10 years since our initiation into Sar-El. In February 1991, while Iraqi scuds were falling on Israel and Purim was approaching, my husband, Martin, and I volunteered our services with the army and were taken to Camp Naftali, near Tiberias, where in its Spartan surroundings, we learned about the paradox of "normalcy" of Israel, and the wages of love.

In the sad déjà vu of our history, only Haman's name changes, Saddam becoming Arafat, spurring us once again to volunteer. This time, we worked at Tzrifin, in the Tel Aviv area, a large military camp with an old and distinguished history, where parts of machinery, from tanks to air conditioners, are restored, packaged and repaired.

Discounting our history, what shall I say about the sweet normalcy of Tzrifin? That again we proudly wore army uniforms. That we took our day's duties from 8 a.m. to 4 p.m. seriously. That we were treated with care and respect, that once the work was adapted to our abilities, it was still valued. That we fostered deep relationships and telescoped time in the close quarters of shared dormitories and communal living. That every day at 7:30 p.m. we learned about the many faces of Israel when two 19-year-old madrichot planned further talks and trips. That on weekends we were taken on trips to see the riches of this special little country. That we learned from each other, Israelis from volunteers – soldiers from civilians and vice versa – about different and shared values, expectations, Judaism, Israel, respect, friendship.

Donia and Martin Clenman

What shall I say about my 79-year-old husband who reflected pleasantly on his busy day and rejoiced in his fatigue at 4 p.m., proof of his service devotion? And what shall I say about my "boss," rejoicing in my Hebrew when, sorting through papers, I discovered a subtle error? And where can I, in so short a time, meet, speak, discuss, debate and carry back lasting memories of a universe?

The universe includes, among others: A Bulgarian truck driver talking about literature while waiting for shipment; a Frenchman from the south of France; a religious Jew, toiling, all tact and kindness, responding with affection for all his people; a not-so-young man from Wyoming, who has been here only 79 times and is affectionately referred by the locals as "General"; a Christian policeman from Saskatoon; a divinity teacher and choral director from Winnipeg; an unusual woman and a man devoted to Sar-El from Montreal; an Israeli colonel extolling our contributions, both emotional and economic; an artist who cannot do the assigned work because of a broken finger on his right hand, gladly painting a mural using only his left hand; a Protestant woman from South Africa, paying her own fare to serve at Sar-El, hungering for knowledge about the people who gave the world eternal dreams and visions.

And last but not least, the universe includes my 19-year-old madrichot in whose young faces I see my children yet, on parting, I tell them, "Here you were also our mothers," and we both have tears in our eyes as they ask me to "Please, come again."

Only in this setting can you meet so diverse a world and part in peace – no, friendship – as we did.

Donia Clenman is a writer living in Toronto.

Jewish Life

Fonts and your browser

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today I conclude my series on Hebrew and the Internet with a look at how to write and read in Hebrew on your computer. Visit these sites to download fonts so that you can create a sign in Hebrew or even learn how you can surf the best that the Hebrew Net has to offer.

Please note that there are different kinds of Hebrew fonts and things can get a bit complicated. Some are true word processing fonts that work with a Hebrew keyboard and operating system such as the ones used in Israel. Other fonts mimic the English keyboard so that if you press the D, you'll get a dalet. And there are fonts that enable you to read Hebrew on your Web browser. In this article, I am concentrating on fonts and programs that are free or are shareware. Of course, there are many fine commercial products that you can purchase if you intend to do extensive work in Hebrew.

Surfing the Net in Hebrew requires a bit of preparation but it is well worth the effort. You will need to do three things: download a special Hebrew/ English font, install it onto your computer and then tell your browser to use that font. Here are three sites that detail the procedure for downloading and installing Hebrew fonts: Tapuz [www. tapuz.co.il/hebrew.htm], Stanford [www.stanford.edu/~nadav/hebrew. html] and Brijnet [www.brijnet.org/ivrit/webheb.htm].

Once your browser speaks Hebrew, where should you go? You can find links to most major Hebrew search engines at the Internet Hebrew Guide [www.internet-guide.co.il/engines.html].

If you are looking for Hebrew fonts, then take a look at Hebrew Font Source [www.webjunkie.co.il/hfs/] and Kesher [keshernet.com/download.htm]. There are many fonts you can download and use in a word processor. Also check out the comprehensive links to other free and commercial Hebrew fonts available on the Web [www.webjunkie.co.il/hfs/otherfonts2.htm] and Hebrew Font Links [jeff.cs.mcgill.ca/~luc/hebrew.html].

The Hebrew Font Source provides fonts for Windows only. If you have a Macintosh, then you'll find a selection at the University of Oregon's Yamada Language Center [babel.uoregon.edu/yamada/fonts/hebrew.html]. Mac users will also love the shareware program Hebrew Pad [ftp://ftp.nilenet.com/pub/users/gweisz/macheb.sea.hqx]. Hebrew Pad allows you to type from right to left and even insert the nekudot (vocalization). When done, just paste your work into a standard word processor. If you know of a comparable freeware or shareware program for Windows, please e-mail me.

For anyone who has grown up used to the English language QWERTY keyboard and wants to learn to type in Hebrew, I highly recommend ZigZag's Hebrew Keyboard Tutor [www.zigzagworld.com/HKTutor/]. This free, on-line "applet" takes quite a long time to load but it's worth the wait. On your screen, you'll see a miniature Hebrew keyboard – A, S, D, F become shin, dalet, gimel, kaf. As the giraffe hangs Hebrew letters on a clothesline, you are prompted to tap the corresponding key. There are five levels and the program keeps track of your accuracy and speed.

I have found two free Hebrew-English dictionaries that you can download and run on Windows computers. With Davar, you type the first few letters of a word and the corresponding word in the other language appears on your screen [members.nbci.com/freedavar/]. Davar is created by what seem to be very dedicated scholars in Czechoslovakia.

Babylon is an interactive program that provides you with instant translation in several languages including English into Hebrew and Yiddish [www.babylon.com]. This Israeli-based program has a free version (with an advertising window). Once it is loaded, you can click on an English word in any program and a window will open with the Hebrew translation. If you want to look up a word, open the Babylon window by clicking on a blank part of your screen, type in your word and the translation will follow. Unfortunately this ingenious program does not translate words from Hebrew.

Last week, I looked at some sites that will help you learn Hebrew online. A special thanks to Mosh Pearl haLevi who has alerted me to the Foundation Stone interactive Hebrew learning program [foundationstone.com.au/]. "I been using it for over a month, learning grammar and doing Torah vocabulary word drills using its biblical Hebrew filter and I'm seeing great progress."

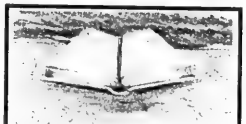
Lions and Leviticus

By RABBI JOHN MOSCOWITZ



I normally watch little television. Yet, when the Discovery Channel yields a look into the marvellous and exotic animal world so foreign to our own, then, somehow, the small screen grows large as life. And I watch.

I'm keen to watch animals hunting other animals. Likewise, an animal mother giving birth to her children literally fascinates me, as do all animals acting as they're supposed to in their own habitat. Actually, I stare at it all – unable to take my eyes off the mélange of lions and tigers, elephants, gorillas, crocodiles and the rest. While most of television is banal and corrupting, the Discovery Channel and National Geographic Explorer are exhilarating and expand our knowledge of the world. I liken this experience to that of the absorbing experience of Jewish text learning and ideas: gravitating toward this animal kingdom, we lose a sense of time as well as the narrowness of our own particular world. We gain a greater understanding of larger matters.

I suspect that I have a fair bit of company among fellow humans. We who live so far from the animal world of which we were once an intimate part are fascinated and often horrified by the stark reality revealed on the Discovery Channel. Our contemporary experience yields little knowledge about this animal reality. Perhaps, though, by virtue of our ancient collective memory residing in us still, we know more than we think.

I think this is why, for me anyway, when say, I watch a lion charge and tackle and then strangle and slowly consume a zebra, I'm both repulsed and fascinated. I cannot take my eyes off the television screen. What I'm staring at is so foreign and yet so entirely familiar.

I don't think it is a stretch to suggest that much of the book of Leviticus – our current synagogue reading – is the Jewish version of this exotic and primitive animal world. The Bible, Leviticus in particular, affords a rather unadulterated look at a "foreign" reality of animal sacrifices, "defiled" people, mothers in childbirth and even an Israelite God every bit as vengeful and wrathful as He is kind and forgiving. Our initial response to Leviticus is akin to our natural response to the Discovery Channel: emotional distancing and even repulsion at times. Yet, if we allow our eyes to stay on the text and its commentaries, intellectual fascination and attachment are likely to follow. This is because the text makes sense of the context: life and death and how God wants us to act in regard to each.

Both the animal world exposed on the Discovery Channel and the world of sacrifices and blood and birth and defilement native to Leviticus graphically and unapologetically show how close life and death are to one another. We learn in both instances that, without an understanding of the final necessity of death, there can be no appreciation and respect for the beauty and purposes of life.

Being confronted with the intimate relationship between life and death on television and in our texts is profoundly shocking and utterly compelling; shock at how easily we fool ourselves that we may escape the natural cycle of life, and the sense of being compelled at the realization of how fortunate we are to be included in it.

ISRAEL'S BIRTHDAY CELEBRATION:

Members of more than 50 Jewish organizations and youth groups turned out last week to celebrate Israel's 53rd birthday. The celebration, sponsored by UJA FEDERATION, began at Earl Bales Park, where the more than 1,500 participants gathered for an Israel Solidarity March. The procession ended at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, where marchers gathered for readings, dancing and singing, as well as addresses by Israel's Consul General Meir Romem in Toronto, and Israel's Prime Minister Ariel Sharon via video. Outreach organization moves into new quarters

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Nishma, an educational outreach organization, has just moved into new quarters at 322 Wilson Ave., just west of Bathurst.

A chanukat habayit, or housewarming, which is to be held May 6, from 11:30 a.m. until 4:30 p.m., will include discussions, socializing, refreshments, divrei Torah and a video presentation for children.

In the evening, at 8 p.m., Nishma's founding director, Rabbi Benjamin Hecht, will give the inaugural lecture, The Ethic of Halachah.

The new spacious quarters, which are wheelchair accessible and include offices, a library and a large room for meetings and classes, will enable Nishma to expand its services not just locally, but nationally and internationally as well.

The organization has a presence outside Toronto, Rabbi Hecht said, noting rather ruefully that "in many ways, we are more recognized internationally [as opposed to locally] in terms of Torah study."

Subscribers to their website and their publications are found all over Canada, and the United States, Israel, France, Germany, Argentina, Australia and even South Korea.

Not only do these subscribers cover the whole spectrum of Jewish observance and knowledge, but some of them aren't even Jewish, Rabbi Hecht said.

When he and his wife, Naomi, founded Nishma in the early 1980s, they thought that they would mainly be giving classes. It was only later that they realized "the challenge of using various print media could increase the audience potential."

Robert Robinson, who is the president of Nishma and a member of Adath Israel, a Conservative congregation, became involved with Nishma after attending a class taught by Rabbi Hecht.

"I found his teaching style and methodology appealing," Robinson said. "He was not dogmatic."

"I give the whole spectrum of opinion on issues," Rabbi Hecht said. "I prod people to think, analyse and investigate. I tell them what different sources say, for instance about abortion, and get them to question."

Dogmatism has always bothered him, the rabbi said. Jews should accept the fact, he said, that people, even rabbis, disagree. The point is for disagreement to be respectful, he said, as were the arguments between the talmudic schools of Hillel and Shammai, which were both accepted as being "the words of the living God."

Robinson appreciates the rabbi's open approach to learning. "Conflicts of ideas erupt all the time," he said. Nevertheless, Robinson recognizes that "although we think of him as a liberal thinker, we know that he is strict about halachah."

The object of the Torah, the rabbi said, is not to divide, but to bring Jews closer together.

"The Torah isn't black and white. If you think like that, you are limiting the beauty of Torah."

Rabbi Hecht is careful to include in his teachings beliefs from non-Orthodox streams of Judaism. "The more people know the philosophical and theological differences that there are, the better it will be for Jewish unity."

Nishma classes and publications deal with very real issues in today's world, such as business and medical ethics, homosexuality, women's place in Judaism, charity, conflict in the Jewish world and spirituality.

Besides classes and courses, Nishma produces a weekly bulletin, called Insight, which deals with philosophical issues arising from current events or the weekly Torah reading, as well as Nishma Junior, a publication for youngsters that includes quizes, book reviews, biographies of Torah personalities and cartoons, and a monthly publication called Introspection, which offers short articles on issues in the community.

"One article talked about how extra stringencies in kashrut observance leads to a breakdown of Jewish community feeling," Rabbi Hecht said.

There are also plans to start a scholarly journal in the next few months, which will come out once or twice a year.

To contact Nishma, call 416-630-0588 or visit their Web site at www.nishma.org.

Law professor pursues community advocacy path

Hopes for increased choices in education system

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — To Ed Morgan, outgoing honorary legal counsel for Canadian Jewish Congress, community legal advocacy work is a fulfilling part of his professional experience.

Morgan, 46, a University of Toronto law professor, has been acclaimed chair of Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario region. He will now be part of the new national officers committee, which will be constituted after CJC's 26th Plenary Assembly to be held here on May 6 and 7.

He has held an official position with CJC for seven years, serving 1½ terms as Ontario legal counsel – he took over John Laskin's term when Laskin was appointed a judge – and his current term as honorary legal counsel.

At U of T, he is the director of the test case litigation program which teaches students how to do constitutional litigation and public interest advocacy.

"I got into Jewish community legal advocacy because it so nicely coincides with the interests I already had; the two go hand in hand.

"My work with CJC fulfills my two ambitions – giving back to the community and pursuing my general academic and policy interests," he says.

Much of the work in his past term, in which he dealt with federal legal matters, was concentrated on legal battles in Canadian courts regarding the prosecution and deportation of Nazi war criminals, and Israel oriented advocacy.

"That advocacy has become so prominent for CJC on a national level that it has filled a huge role in the life of all the national officers in the past few years," he says.

Morgan was also involved in an ongoing case against the Canadian Armed Forces, regarding Jews being excluded from important positions during the Persian Gulf campaign.

Currently, Morgan, who was legal counsel for parents who went to the Supreme Court regarding the denominational school funding case, sees regional issues and those that engage the provincial government, as being the most prominent issues. "These include social policy, eldercare and school funding, which remains the most prominent issue in Ontario," he says.

He is not "naively optimistic" about obtaining school funding for private religious schools, "but at least the Harris government has embraced the idea of choice as a philosophical approach to education.

"I am hoping that with increased lobbying and with continuing pressure on the provincial government, choices will be expanded to include private religious school as well as the public system."

Those within CJC Ontario region have to work hard to make the government understand the needs and desires of the Canadian Jewish community, says Morgan. "These include not only Jewish day schools, but the education policy generally. We have a large sector of our community that is concerned about what is going on in public education."

It is also important, he says, to focus on outreach to other communities in Ontario. "Ontario is the most multicultural of the provinces; that is what makes life rich for us here," he says.

Morgan was recently involved in a year-long legal battle with the Ontario government regarding black community nursing homes. "The African Canadian community is very concerned about eldercare. These kind of alliances between the Jewish community and other communities in Ontario are very important.

"I am taking that attitude with me to Congress, that we work in alliance with other communities when we approach the government on social issues," he says.

Congress needs to study how small communities across the province can best be served, says Morgan. "We have to make sure that these communities do not feel cut off from the larger centres of Jewish life.

"It is particularly important to reach out to young people in smaller communities. Congress in Ontario has been doing that, but we have to figure out ways to continue that work and strengthen it. It is very easy for Jewish students on university campuses to lose their Jewish identity, and we have to be pro-active in making sure there are programs in place to make sure that will not happen," he says.

It is especially important in times like this, he says, "when pro-Israel groups are under pressure on campuses. Jewish students sometimes feel lost in this kind of environment and we have to make sure they have strong support and a good network to strengthen Jewish identity."

Morgan notes he has a lot of issues to tackle, but with this year away from teaching, "I will have a substantial amount of time to devote to them."

Bukharan Jew traces roots back 250 years

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

One of many photos on Jeffrey Mammon's website.

TORONTO — For many Jews, the community is either Ashkenazi or Sephardi.

However, ask Jeffrey Mammon about his background and he will answer that he is Bukharan – not Ashkenazi and not Sephardi.

"Growing up in Toronto, it was always difficult to explain my heritage," Mammon said in an interview. "It became my goal to learn about and share the Bukharan Jewish experience with the rest of the community."

While attending the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, a Grade 9 project into his family lineage led Mammon to Bukhara, an area which includes Jews from Tajikistan, Uzbekistan and other Central Asian republics.

Since then, with the help of his father Emmanuel and his uncle David, Jeffrey has managed to trace his genealogy back 250 years over 12 generations – back to Rabbi Yosef Maman, who travelled to Bukhara from Safed, Israel in 1742.

The Bukharan Jews believe that they were once a part of the Babylonian Jewish community that somehow settled in Central Asia, Mammon explained. Because they never travelled through Spain, they are not Sephardi.

Over the years, many Jews fled from Muslim oppression in Iran and settled in the area. Immigrants also arrived from Afghanistan and then, because Bukhara was on the Silk Road, from India.

Jewish ethnic groups came from all over, including recent immigrants from Russia and Poland, and they all blended into the Judeo-Persian milieu – becoming Bukharan Jews.

When Rabbi Maman al-Maghrebi, who was born in Tetuan, Morocco, arrived in Bukhara in the 18th century, the community had been politically separated from other Jewish cultural centres.

"Rabbi Maman found that many of the Jews were lacking in their observance of religious customs and Jewish law," Mammon said.

"He decided to stay and assist the community and became their Chief Rabbi. His teachings would later influence many Bukharan Jews to make aliyah to Israel.

"When they arrived in Israel at the turn of the century, the community established their own society and institutions.

"My own family travelled by foot in a caravan through Afghanistan, Iran, Syria and Lebanon to Israel. In 1896, they arrived in Jerusalem and settled in the Bukharan Quarter," Mammon said.

"Many more Bukharan Jews would later arrive in Jerusalem just before the onset of the Russian Communist invasion of Bukhara, Samarkand and Tashkent in the 1920s."

"My branch of the Mammons immigrated to Canada and the United States in the early 1960s. Over the years, the spelling of the name evolved."

Until 1991, very little was known about Bukharan Jews, Mammon pointed out. At that time, "the republic of Uzbekistan obtained its independence and the majority of Bukharan Jews left for Israel and New York under Operation Exodus."

During the last 10 years, about 150,000 Jews of Bukharan origin have departed from the newly formed republics of the former Soviet Union and moved to Israel or the United States, Mammon said.

As a result, a renaissance of Bukharan language and culture has emerged in parts of Israel and in Queens, New York, Mammon noted, where there are two or three Bukharan synagogues and several kosher Bukharan restaurants.

"In Toronto, there are about 150 families who meet at the Jewish Russian Community Centre," said Rabbi Yosef Zaltzman, spiritual leader of the centre.

"They are very organized, with a committee and a president."

Right now, Rabbi Zaltsman said, we are looking to bring a Bukharan rabbi to look after the community, someone who is familiar with the Judeo-Tajiki language and culture.

Bukharan traditions – the music, food, dancing, headdresses and robes – are all still an important part of our celebrations, Mammon said.

"It is important for our older relatives to see our traditions stay alive."

Jews and the census: our origins are important

By JACK JEDWAB
Special to The CJN

Once every five years, the Census takes a detailed look at the Canadian population, providing us with a wealth of demographic, social and economic information about the people in our country.

Census Day in Canada is May 15. During the first two weeks of May, more than 11.8 million households will receive census questionnaires. This year, there has been some controversy in the preparation of the Census regarding the question of ethnic origin and ancestry. At issue is the high number of persons who indicate that their ethnic origins and ancestry are Canadian. Some legitimately believe that this answer reflects a presence in the country over several generations. Yet others, who encourage all citizens to respond this way, wrongly believe that they are strengthening national identity. As a result of the confusion that was created around the ethnicity question, there was some talk of removing it altogether from the forthcoming Census. Fortunately for the Jewish community of Canada and for many other groups, this was not the case.

Over the course of the twentieth century, each Census reflected the profound changes to Canadian society, due in large part to immigration. During the last forty years, the Census has become an invaluable tool, particularly in determining the changing needs of Jewish communities. People can identify themselves as Jewish on either the basis of the question on ethnic origins or on religion (the latter question is asked only every ten years). In most parts of the country, however, the religion question does not capture all those who define themselves as Jewish. Both questions are therefore essential if we are to properly respond to the needs of those throughout the country who define themselves as Jewish on the basis of their ethnic origins and ancestry.

Questions about ancestry bring up the issue of the relationship between our ethnic origins and our citizenship. Some view these as synonymous, in that they are both presumably rooted in national identities. Others see them as contradictory and contend that declaring ethnic origins or ancestries detracts from Canadian citizenship and national identity. But surely one can possess a strong national identity and continue to have many different origins. An Angus Reid poll reported that some 95 percent of Canadians agreed that "you can be proud of being Canadian and be proud of your ancestry at the same time." Nor is there any contradiction between being Canadian and being Jewish.

By and large, members of the Jewish community understand the importance of their origins. They also value societies that support ethnic and religious pluralism. Canadian Jewry has been at the forefront in the defence of diversity and multicultural policies. Questions on ethnic origin and ancestry have a long history in Canada and have been included in the Census since 1871. Today, collecting information on ethnic origins is critical to strengthening Canada's multicultural character. By consequence, this information gathered by Statistics Canada remains as relevant as ever.

When the ethnicity question appears on the census, those who are of Jewish ancestry should respond accordingly. They should not presume that their attachment to Canada is being tested. In the month of May, to be counted amongst the population requires completing the Census questionnaire. Its success depends on the participation of everyone who lives in this country. In so doing, we strengthen our society and our communities. It is a privilege of which we all should take advantage.

BJE rewards innovative teaching

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Shortly after assuming the position of executive director of the Board of Jewish Education, Seymour Epstein introduced a program to encourage creative and dynamic teachers.

Called Etgar (Hebrew for challenge), the program, which is now in its second year, encourages teachers to participate in the creation of an innovative curriculum. Teams of three teachers or more from day and/or supplementary schools apply for funding and other means of assistance for projects pertaining to Jewish education.

"Dr. Epstein felt there was a need for teachers to express their creativity," said Anne Glickman, the BJE's director of early childhood and Jewish family education.

Glickman and BJE education consultant Silvia Eilath, the spokespersons for the project, also staff the committee that reviews the proposals.

They explained that Etgar was part of Midrash, a mechanism for educational change recently initiated by the BJE.

Etgar offers support – financial, technical and mentoring – to the projects that are approved. Recipients are eligible for grants of $500 to $5,000 and they are hooked up with mentors drawn from the educational community.

Teams of teachers, from the same or different schools, submit proposals to the BJE to explore any area of Jewish education, such as curriculum design and teaching strategies. The review committee, which includes Epstein, Pearl Goldberg, Aaron Nussbaum, Martin Sable and Hesh Troper, evaluates the submissions.

So far, they have been kept busy by applicants, Eilath said. "We're thrilled with the response."

But not all projects get the green light, Glickman said. "We received many project submissions. The committee worked hard to choose projects that served our community best."

By winter of 2000, the first three projects were accepted and work on them began shortly after. One of them, a CD-ROM for trees and ecology in the Jewish tradition, was submitted by a number of schools, Glickman said.

The teachers working on the CD-ROM have been in contact with an environmental group in Israel, Eilath added.

Another project from last winter, which also involves teachers from multiple schools, is the development of a Canadian Jewish history curriculum to be used by junior high students, Glickman said.

"It will be linked to the existing curriculum at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto [CHAT] where a course in Canadian history is currently being offered.

"The [elementary] day schools will have a common curriculum on Canadian Jewish history that will prepare their students for a higher level of the course at CHAT."

The third project accepted was the development of a curriculum with material on Sephardi Jews, Eilath said. The team and their mentor, all Sephardi educators, are putting together a unit on the holiday cycles, she said.

"They are trying to enhance the existing curriculum throughout the Jewish day schools," Glickman said. "We are making sure that the students are exposed to all the cultures and traditions of the different ethnic groups in Judaism."

Glickman said that the team is putting together a "multidimensional kit" with video demonstrations of lessons on the various units which will include prayers and minhagim, music and recipes.

In the second year, six new projects were approved. One of the projects was submitted by a supplementary school; the team put together a curriculum based on multiple intelligence principles and managed to implement a unit at Chanukah, Eilath said. "They did it very successfully."

Another project recently approved, called Firsts for Jewish Women, was put together by a team from a day and supplementary school.

They are developing a curriculum that will give students a deeper understanding of the role Jewish women played in history, Eilath said. The first women rabbis and women from the Bible, as well as more modern historical figures such as Golda Meir, are among those to be featured.

Glickman stressed that these projects are all being done on the teachers' own time.

"It has been extremely gratifying to receive projects from teams who have joined forces from different schools and even some projects that include both day and supplementary teachers," Glickman and Eilath said.

Proposals are now being accepted by the BJE for the academic year 2001-2002. For information call 416-633-7770 ext. 238.

Stress in the classroom

"Class management and student behaviour is usually the first sign that something is not right," Ferguson said.

Then, it is up to the administration to intervene in a positive way.

Administrators should be discussing lesson and curriculum planning, class control and class management with the affected teacher, Ferguson said.

While it is sometimes useful to role model effective teaching, Weininger said, "it isn't sufficient."

"The problem is that there is no reinforcement, so that over a period of time, teachers gradually go back to their own styles.

"When parents begin to notice changes in their children's behaviour, it may be time to intervene."

However, parents do face the real danger that the teacher's frustrations will be taken out on their child, Weininger said.

And that is why it is important for parents to work together with several people in the school – from the phys-ed teacher, to consultants, to principals in order to support their child, Weininger said.

Jewish Family & Child Service and Jewish Vocational Services offer some assistance for students and teachers.

Joy Koplowitz, a psychoeducational consultant with JVS said that services are available to help evaluate students, and sometimes strategies are suggested to help teachers cope.

In some situations, simply cutting down instruction time can improve things. In other cases, remedial staff can be added in the classrooms to help teachers, Koplowitz said.

One of the many programs JF&CS has provided for teachers is a group that deals specifically with stress.

"In one school, there is a group of teachers who come in weekly – on their own time – for 35 or 45 minutes for 6 to 8 weeks. We do stress management, relaxation and visualization," Feffer said.

"In all situations, we encourage parents to see schools as being partners and not adversaries," Feffer said.

"It is important that parents and schools communicate with each other in order to achieve the best for their children."

Parents need to realize that there are other issues in schools – unions and administrative levels that have been in place for a long time and have to be dealt with, she said.

But parents shouldn't give up. They need to get involved in school councils and Parent Teacher Associations in order to make their voices heard.

Israel's first female rabbi lives out her dream

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Kinneret Shiryon, Israel's first female rabbi and founder of Kehillat Yozma, a Reform community in Modi'in, is living out a dream.

Growing up in California, the New York native lived among non-Jews and often found herself in the position of explaining Judaism.

"The more I explained, the more I wanted to explain, and the more I wanted to learn," said Rabbi Shiryon on a recent visit to Toronto under the auspices of ARZA/World Union, the Zionist arm of Reform Judaism.

Rabbi Kinneret Shiryon

"The synagogue was my home away from home. I loved leading services at junior congregation; I was a know-it-all and a wisecrack at Hebrew school."

Her parents were among the founders of a small congregation in California, she said, and as a teenager she was given the task of teaching youngsters.

"I loved teaching and by the time I was 15, even though I had no role models, I saw myself as a rabbi."

By the time she was ordained by Hebrew Union College/Jewish Institute of Religion in New York – there were 12 women in her class – there were 22 female rabbis in the world. "I used to know every one. I am happy to say that today it is impossible to know them all. We have made great strides."

She moved to Israel, she said, "because I felt that the way to live out the most authentic Jewish life would be to live there. It just made sense to me; I felt that I wanted to go home, and home was Israel.

"I had always seen myself as a rabbi in Israel. I believed that Israelis should learn about the richness, diversity and wealth of Jewish expression that have been developed in the Diaspora. I felt I had a role.

"I found myself being seriously tested, but I think I have made inroads in terms of my goal. In my own small way, I feel that I have changed the face of Israeli society."

It is not easy, however, she admits. "Every day I am hitting my head against a brick wall, because I am female, because I am Reform, and because of the societal bias towards Orthodoxy as the only legitimate form of Judaism. I must have a hard head.

"Things are different, however, because [the Reform movement] has been functioning and growing, and people are aware of who we are. We've waged battles for religious rights and we have brought Reform in Israel to people's consciousness. Despite the odds, we have managed to inculcate [our philosophy] into the minds of secular Israelis."

There is still a long way to go, she said, "but we are on a wave that will only get larger. Eventually, we will bring Israelis closer to the mindset of Diaspora, where all Jews are on equal footing.

"In Israel, we have never been on equal footing. The Orthodox have always gotten institutional funding and institutional recognition, where we have not. They are not willing to give that up so quickly."

Eventually, she said, that mindset will break down. "Orthodoxy will be important, but it will not have a monopoly over the lives of the Jewish people."

Many people are threatened by Reform Judaism, she said, because it gives people a choice. "Freedom, however, is having choices, and taking responsibility for the choices that we make. Reform Judaism, Conservative Judaism and any form of liberal Judaism allow people to make choices. That is what we are all about."

She is less a celebrity than when she arrived in Israel, she said, but she was recently presented with the Career Woman of the Year Award by Modi'in. "That was a tremendous vote of confidence for me. I carry the briefcase I won with a sense of pride that they have recognized me."

She is also grateful to the Canadian Reform Jewish community, she said, "which has recognized the importance of our work in Israel and has worked hard to build bridges between us by supporting, both spiritually and financially, our pilot project in Modi'in.

"The Canadian community is helping us to strive towards a religious expression that they have always had."

Although Kehillat Yozma now operates out of a prefabricated building, the city of Modi'in has allocated land to the congregation, which plans to build a permanent home there.

"I believe that once we have the physical facilities, we will grow by leaps and bounds. It will give us presence in Modi'in, and it will reflect the communal aspect of who we are.

"I still have a vision, and I am still working hard to achieve it," she said.

WALK WITH

LET'S TALK FUNWALK

Walk...run...rain or sun. Get ready for UJA FEDERATION's ISRAEL FUNWALK and FUNRUN. Rain or shine Jewish Toronto's most popular annual event will take place Monday, May 21st at 10:30 a.m. sharp! ISRAEL FUNWALK registration begins at 9:15 a.m. at Nathan Phillips Square. Pre-registration is also available to those participants who drop off their sponsorship kits by Thursday, May 10th at UJA FEDERATION, 4600 Bathurst St.; Camp Connection, Lawrence Plaza; Israel's Gift and Judaica Centre, 441 Clark Avenue West or 897 Eglinton Avenue West; the Bloor Jewish Community Centre, 750 Spadina Avenue and the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, 4588 Bathurst Street.

Last year 8,000 Funwalkers and runners raised $200,000 for UJA FEDERATION.

This year's 7km route will wind its way from City Hall to Ontario Place where participants will be treated to a fabulous festival featuring rides, games, refreshments, live entertainment and celebrations marking Yom Yerushalayim.

"This is an especially important year for us to demonstrate our solidarity with Israel," notes Elyza Litwin Polsky, who is chairing ISRAEL FUNWALK 2001 with Abe Glowinsky.

Another way to help Jewish families in need is to drop off your new and gently-used clothing at the Just-A-Second Shop/ Jewish Family & Child Service Clothing Drive at Nathan Phillips Square.

This year, the celebration of the ISRAEL FUNWALK will be of particularly marked poignancy.

At a time when Israel is facing great external pressures, and often isolation by the world community, it is of utmost significance that we show our solidarity. The Toronto Jewish community has long shown its vibrancy and faithful support for Israel and this year's FUNWALK offers the community, young and old alike, a festive opportunity to demonstrate that solidarity at a most crucial time. I look forward to the community's participation in this proud and joyous event.

Meir Romem,
Consul General of Israel

SHOW YOUR SOLIDARITY

Thousands walking as one. That's how Toronto's Jewish community will send a message to the world on Monday, May 21, Yom Yerushalayim. Israel is not alone.

"The FUNWALK has always been about celebrating our bond with Israel," explains Abe Glowinsky who is co-chairing the event with Elyza Litwin Polsky. "But this year it's more important than ever, in light of Israel's difficult situation and unfair criticism it receives daily. This year it is more crucial than ever that we demonstrate our support for our Jewish homeland and the Jewish people," adds Glowinsky.

Participants will also be able to show their support for Israel by signing a petition which will be circulated at the FUNWALK, calling on various political leaders to intervene on behalf of Israelis kidnapped by the terrorist Hizbullah organization.

"Just by being at the FUNWALK, you'll be demonstrating support for Israel at a very difficult time," stresses Litwin Polsky. "Participating in the FUNWALK takes little effort, but it makes a major statement about solidarity with Israel."

RIBBONS TO REMEMBER

As a visible expression of partnership with Israel, UJA FEDERATION FUNWALK participants will be wearing blue ribbons on Monday, May 21.

The Blue Ribbon Campaign is a response to the kidnapping last fall of three Israeli soldiers and one Israeli citizen by Hizbullah terrorists. No word has been heard yet on the fate of Benny Avraham, 21, Adi Avitan 21, Omar Souad, 26 and 54 year-old Elchanan Tanenbaum since last October.

Blue ribbons have become a symbol representing Jewish solidarity as Israel continues its struggle for security amid violence and tension.

"We're anticipating a sea of blue," explains Abe Glowinsky. "But we need all the help we can get to make sure everyone who wants to wear a ribbon has one."

Community members, 13 years and older, are invited to help FUNWALK volunteers prepare thousands of blue ribbons at the Lipa Green Building, 4600 Bathurst Street, on Sunday, May 6 from 10:00 a.m. – 12:00 p.m. and Wednesday, May 16, 7:00 p.m. – 9:00 p.m.

To register please call Donna Draycott at 416-635-2883 ext. 320 or via e-mail at ddraycott@ujafed.org.

STUDENTS STAND BY ISRAEL

Hundreds of students are going the extra mile at this year's ISRAEL FUNWALK by participating in special school projects that involve decorating solidarity items, some of them for Yom Yerushalayim. The students will then wear and display their works which include hats, buttons and murals at the FUNWALK.

"These projects offer students a way to feel even more connected to the cause," explains Sherry Zweig, who is chairing the initiative. "Although kids think of the Walk, first and foremost, as something fun, this year especially, we want to instill in them a sense of responsibility for their brothers and sisters in Israel and Jews everywhere."

"Our kids understand the importance of standing by and protecting Israel," notes Brenda Goldstein, Supervisor at Associated Hebrew Schools, Kamin branch. "This is another great opportunity to demonstrate our oneness with Israel," adds Zita Gardner, Director of Leo Baeck Day School, which is also participating in the special solidarity projects.

POGO helps kids survive

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Vanessa Yakobson, a survivor of Hodgkins disease, and her young son, Noah.
[Photo Hudson Taylor]

TORONTO — Sometimes in the glitz and excitement of charity events, those involved lose sight of their true purpose.

Vanessa Yakobson, organizer of an event called Party for POGO (Pediatric Oncology Group of Ontario) and founder of the organization's young leadership campaign, can't do that.

Yakobson, 29, works in corporate marketing. She is the mother of 18-month-old Noah and is expecting another child in the fall.

But when she was 13, on vacation in South Africa, she discovered a lump on her neck. Back home, she was diagnosed with Hodgkins disease, a cancer of the lymph nodes and bone marrow.

For six months, she told The CJN, she underwent chemotherapy at the Hospital for Sick Children. Luckily, she was able to take it as an outpatient, and so missed only one day of school for each treatment.

When her lungs became inflamed and scarred as a reaction to the chemotherapy, it was decided that the therapy had been effective enough to stop it and concentrate on healing her lungs. She started high school, eventually earned a BA in drama at the University of Toronto and an MBA at the Kellogg School at Northwestern university in Chicago, and went to work in the corporate world.

The whole experience, she said, changed her fundamentally. "It gave me an appreciation for life and all life has to offer. It made me realize how fragile life is." Even more, she feels that "it was an experience I was given to learn from – to realize the importance of giving back to the community and making a positive impact on others."

With her father Anthony Melman, a senior vice-president and partner at Toronto-based Onyx Corporation, she decided to help establish the POGO chair-in childhood cancer control for the Pediatric Oncology Group of Ontario, which aims to co-ordinate research and care services for children with cancer and acts as an adviser to the Ministry of Health on pediatric cancer care.

While Melman went the corporate route, contacting business colleagues and affluent friends, Yakobson decided to target younger people, those "just starting to make decisions about which charity to be involved with."

The idea, she said, is that over the years, they will become bigger givers.

She is now organizing the second Party for POGO, which last year raised $30,000. The event, which will be held May 4 at the Capitol Event Theatre, will feature the band The Travoltas, a silent auction, '70s music and a raffle.

Corin Greenberg, the executive director of POGO, said in an interview that the organization began as a grassroots drive in the 1980s, when health professionals realized that a study on cancer in the province had nothing about children. For several years, it operated with very little funding, moving from place to place as space became available.

One of its most important accomplishments, she feels, is a database, unique in the world, that has information on children with cancer and can track them over time.

Cancer treatment for children in Ontario is centred at five locations: the Children's Hospital of Western Ontario in London, the Children's Hospital of Eastern Ontario in Ottawa, Children's Hospital at the Hamilton Health Sciences Corporation, Kingston General Hospital and the Hospital for Sick Children in Toronto.

POGO, which takes a multidisciplinary approach, including doctors, nurses, social workers, psychologists, nutritionists, pharmacists, child care workers, and data managers, suggested the setting up of satellite programs, so that children need not always go to the main centres for treatment.

"Children may be in treatment for four years," Greenberg said. The impact on all aspects of family life is enormous.

The satellite centres, located in Orillia, Kitchener-Waterloo, Sudbury, Toronto and Windsor, offer some chemotherapy, and treatment for fevers and leukopenia, a severe drop in white blood cell count. Staff receives specialized training and has a close relationship with experts in the main treatment centres.

Mark Greenberg, medical director of POGO, said one of its unique characteristics is that "it is not an institution, but a group of people, including patients and their families, who can determine how treatment for childhood cancer fits into larger social and health domains."

The social implications of the disease are important, he said. "How can we help children return to normal life after being sick? What are the implications of changing treatments? What is the cost of a cure, not just in dollars, but on the quality of life for the child and his or her family? How can we deliver care that is cost efficient and least costly to parents?"

Ontario is lucky, he said, in that because all care is paid for by one entity, "long term effects can be tracked five years to 40 years down the line."

In most places, he said, children "disappear" into the adult population, and it may not be recognized that an adult's illness or condition has its roots in treatment for chemotherapy given as a youngster.

The purpose of creating a chair in childhood cancer control, which will be established with a $5-million endowment fund, according to Mark Greenberg, is to "bring together pragmatics with methodology, so that there will be a better understanding of the bigger picture of childhood cancer."

Real, not fake protests in Quebec City

By SARAH ZELCER
Special to The CJN

When I announced at my family's Passover seder that I intended to go to Quebec City to attend the protests related to the Summit of the Americas, the reaction was part fear and part confusion. The fear was for my safety, and because of all the intense coverage of potentially violent groups of protesters who most certainly would behave like animals and obliterate everything and everyone who came in their way. The confusion was because no one could quite figure out why a nice girl like me would possibly want to go protesting in Quebec City.

I got this response from a number of people before I left, people who bought all the hype in the media and believed that the street protesters would congregate for no other reason than to cause trouble. When it came down to it, no one believed that the thousands of individuals heading there, placards, costumes, and slogans in hand, had any real political agenda, solidarity or authenticity. The "real" protesters, ranging from angry anti-globalization student groups to labour unions, were seen as the relative minority – the ones who were part of political movements, and whose opposition to the FTAA and its social, economic, and political implications was connected to their ideological roots in those movements. The "fake" protesters were seen as the masses that arrived in Quebec City as cultural voyeurs who attended the protests because they thought that it was going to be another Woodstock. Most people believed that the "real" and "fake" protesters would simply cancel each other out, and would emerge from the weekend with nothing legitimate to show from it.

Many people who support this way of thinking wouldn't qualify me as a "real" protester. After all, even on the bus on the way to Quebec, I hadn't yet made up my mind about the FTAA or its implications concerning corporate power, indigenous rights or the environment. I was going to Quebec City to learn more, and to engage with the communities of people who were gathering there. I saw the Summit and the subsequent protests as an incredible opportunity to gain understanding about the issues being debated by the 34 leaders comfortably housed behind the "Wall of Shame."

It is now post-Summit, and I have returned from Quebec City relatively unscathed. Having witnessed the events of last weekend, it has become clear to me why the concept of "fake" protesting just doesn't exist. The individuals who participated in last weekend's Second Peoples Summit, the peace rally and direct-action protests were there because they identified with the struggle that was taking place. No matter who they were, what their views, where they had come from or why they were there, the people that surrounded me had an absolutely authentic, legitimate right to be there. There was no one view or political statement expressed in solidarity from the mass assembly – rather, everyone added their own piece, forming a collection of colourful, intelligent and thoughtful folks who just wanted their voices to be heard. From the wonderful Raging Grannies, with their flamboyant flower hats and unquenchable spirits, to those who were able to retain their senses of joy and irreverence despite the oppressive police presence and the clouds of tear-gas that engulfed them, through drumming circles, street theatre, resource-sharing, storytelling, workshops and animated exchanges.

I'm grateful that I went to Quebec City, and was able to witness what was really going on. As a result, I was able to see beyond the breathless newspaper coverage and uncovered the creative, dynamic, urgent energies that were present amongst the tens of thousands of individuals gathered together.

University of British Columbia receives $1-million gift for Jewish law, ethics chair

By MARLANE PRESS
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — A $1-million donation by the Diamond Foundation to the University of British Columbia will be matched by the university, creating a $2-million endowment in perpetuity.

The Diamond gift will establish a chair in Jewish law and ethics. The chair will conduct research and teach Jewish philosophy and history.

The chair will also serve to enlarge the understanding in Jewish and non-Jewish communities of the profound and longstanding Jewish involvement in the development of law and ethics, said university representatives.

Richard Menkis, an associate professor at UBC specializing in modern Jewish studies, believes the creation of the chair recognizes the development and growth in size and significance of Vancouver's Jewish community, the third-largest in Canada.

"The Jewish community is one that I have seen develop and I'm thrilled about this first really secure position," Menkis said.

"It's a real anchor. The position involves teaching and research and explaining the Jewish experience from within – in other words, the classic Judaic sources. But there is also going to be a large community component."

The Diamond Foundation, established in 1984, serves the educational needs of the Jewish community and supports UBC's longstanding commitment to Jewish studies.

'Will provide a unique, essential voice in discussion of social and political issues'

Philip Chown, UBC's senior development officer for the faculty of arts, said the Diamonds were committed to creating a university position that would serve the larger Jewish community's interests.

"[They] asked... how the chair would be involved with the community, in terms of giving lectures or teaching Jewish school teachers, for example," he said.

Over a period of about a year and a half, UBC and the Diamond Foundation developed an outline for the proposed chair. Though the specific functions and mandate have yet to be finalized, Menkis expects that in addition to teaching on campus, the chair will give public lectures and be called upon for expertise in Jewish law and ethics.

"This is an important step at UBC which will have an impact and resonance far beyond campus," said Alan Tully, dean of the university's faculty of arts.

"The chair will provide a unique and essential voice and perspective in discussion of social and political issues at a local, national, and international level."

This past fall, the university was invited to make a formal presentation to the Diamond Foundation, Chown said.

At the presentation, Menkis said, he and his colleagues "enjoyed the privilege of speaking with all three Diamond generations."

"It was really very special that we had all three generations in on it. Perhaps we were the last group to be in that position," he said.

The position will be advertised over the next six months and the successful candidate will occupy the chair during the 2002/2003 academic year.

NYGH expands long-term care facilities

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — To alleviate a critical shortage of long-term care hospital beds in the city, a new wing has been built in the North York General Hospital's (NYGH) Seniors' Health Centre (SHC), just north of Sheppard on Buchan Court.

"With a rapidly growing number of seniors in our society, the expansion of these services across the province is a vital part of the government's commitment to provide 20,000 new long-term beds by 2004," said Tony Clement, the minister of health and long-term care, who officially opened the new wing.

"We salute North York General for creating a wonderful unit that addresses the community's needs and for expanding its services."

Also at the recent opening, Ken Morrison, chair of the hospital's board of governors, announced plans to develop a new 151-bed, long-term care facility in north-central Toronto. The proposed location is the former McNicoll Public School on McNicoll Avenue in the Finch Avenue and Don Mills Road area.

NYGH, with sites at Branson and at Leslie Street and Sheppard Avenue, is affiliated with the University of Toronto. The area served by the hospital has one of the oldest populations in the city. There are more than 2,000 people waiting for a long-term care bed in the former City of North York – and some will wait for months or years for the services they need.

The SHC is evolving and expanding to meet the mandate of Ontario's Health Services Restructuring Commission and the changing health care needs of the community, Morrison said.

"NYGH is a recognized leader in providing long-term care and specialized geriatric services to seniors in the community."

He pointed out that the centre's fourth floor, 32-bed wing, which was completed last fall, was designed to ensure that the needs of the elderly and their family members for comfortable and personalized space are met in a dignified way.

Each resident room contains custom-built and installed armoires, shelves and bedside tables. The dining room, lounges, terraces and activity rooms are conveniently located on the same floor.

Residents can put personal memorabilia in memory boxes outside each room and are encouraged to decorate their own rooms with items from home.

Dianne Anderson, vice-president of NYGH, said, "Our new unit surpasses government standards for creating a homelike environment and improving the quality of life for seniors."

NYGH offers a range of specialized geriatric day and long-term care services. This continuum of care, says Anderson, is co-ordinated through the SHC, part of the Regional Geriatric Program of Toronto.

Some of the services available to seniors through the SHC include the Elders' Clinic – for specialized assessments by geriatricians and other health professionals; the Acute Geriatric Unit – an inpatient unit at the Leslie site for complex problems; and the psychogeriatric service-in-home assessments for physical and mental health problems associated with aging; as well as facilities for osteoporosis and Parkinson's, and fall clinics.

An Ambulatory Care Centre will also be developed at the Branson Division site in 2002-03. This facility will focus on seniors with a wide range of health problems and offer specialized geriatric services – an integrated system of health care for seniors in the community, Anderson said.

Seniors and their family members can obtain information on health issues and the SHC services by calling 416-756-6050.

For Better or Worse cartoonist delights audience

By JULIA KOLLEK
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — Lynn Johnston, creator of For Better or Worse, delighted her audience with her cartoons and stories at the recent Na'amat Author's Luncheon.

With a sense of humour, and her felt pen drawing furiously on an overhead projector, she talked about her unhappy first marriage, her struggle as a single mother, and the creation of her highly successful comic strip that now appears in more than 2000 papers in Canada, the United States, and 23 other countries around the world.

The luncheon, which was the 17th-annual fund-raising event for the two Hamilton chapters of Na'amat, attracted a crowd of almost 400. Na'amat is a women's movement that works to provide support such as legal counselling and homes for abused women and children in Israel, regardless of their religion.

Johnston, whose work is translated into eight languages, was the first cartoonist to be awarded the Media Human Rights Special Award by the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith. She was honoured for "the outstanding diversity of issues in her comic strip," including multiculturalism, sexual orientation, disabilities and aging.

Although she was born in Collingwood, Ont., and is not herself Jewish, Johnston nevertheless has a strong connection with Hamilton and with the city's Jewish community. When she and her then husband moved here in 1969, she was unable to find work in her chosen field of animation, so she took a job as a medical artist at McMaster University. It was there she met Marjorie Baskin and her husband Rabbi Bernard Baskin from Temple Anshe Sholom. She and the Baskin family became close friends – she describes the couple as her "surrogate parents."

The beginning of Johnston's career as a cartoonist coincided with the pregnancy of her first child, Aaron. During pregnancy check-ups, her obstetrician, Dr. Murray Enkin, asked her to make some drawings for the ceilings above his examining tables. Over eight months' worth of visits, she produced more than 80 comic drawings.

Lynn Johnston

Marjorie Baskin then encouraged her to have the drawings published in a book, and the collection became David, We're Pregnant. To date, the book has sold over 300,000 copies.

Shortly after it was published, Johnston was divorced. These were difficult times, she said, but she assured the audience, "I'm not a quitter."

She set up a studio in a greenhouse, and found work designing anything – leaflets, cereal boxes and book illustrations. More of her cartoons were published, and she also met and married Rod Johnston, then a dental student. (Rabbi Baskin married the couple in a civil ceremony.)

For Better or Worse – a series based on her own family – began simply as The Johnstons when Universal Press Syndicate asked if she was interested in doing a daily comic strip. Fearing a rejection, she sent off 20 samples of her humorous, down-to-earth look at parenting. She was asked to sign up for a 20-year contract.

The continuing story of Elly (named after a close friend who had passed away) and her family and friends has been running now since 1979.

"People always ask me how I come up with the ideas," Johnston said. "Those are the questions we cartoonists ask each other. I can only say that it's like wakeful dreaming.

"You become the character you are writing about. If Elly is angry and my husband Rod walks into the room, I shout at him!

"I feel I am living on another plane. It is also an escape for me. When my father was dying, I sat next to his bed with paper and pen and write and escape into my imaginary life," she said.

Setting down this imaginary world is no doubt demanding. Johnston employs a manager, graphic designer, Web site designer and two assistants to help her answer all her correspondence. She starts work every morning at 8:30 a.m. and works through weekends and holidays to keep ahead of her deadlines. She always begins with a punchline, and works backwards. The talent, she says, is to work with the restriction of only having four boxes to tell your story.

Her readers take her stories seriously. Elly and her family are treated like real people, especially as Johnston has used her cartoon strip to air serious issues. When one of the characters, Lawrence, came out and announced he was gay, Johnston was bombarded with sacks of mail (mostly supportive). The mail also flowed when the cartoon's family dog Farley had a fling and became a father. Angry letters declared Johnston should have had the dog neutered.

For the most part, though, her admirers are dedicated. At the end of the luncheon, they waited patiently in a long line-up for her autograph. Going well over the alloted time, Johnston took the trouble to talk to each person, ask about the dedication and inscribe an original cartoon.

With pen hovering, she pondered the question of what For Better or For Worse would be like if it featured a Jewish family.

"Much funnier!" she laughed.

El Al restructures its Canadian operations

Manchester, Copenhagen, Vienna, Chicago and Miami, as well as flights originating in Toronto. The airline is expected to compete more heavily on the London, Paris, Amsterdam and Zurich routes.

El Al attributed its losses to the Palestinian uprising, which began in October 2000. "As an immediate result of this...there was a significant fall-off in incoming tourism, widespread cancellation of bookings that were already in the system and also a drop in outgoing tourism...These events have a significant influence on the company's revenues and profits...The aforementioned events are likely to have an effect on the company's business results in 2001 as well," stated a draft report presented to El Al's board of directors.

Other factors affecting El Al's profitability include a drastic rise in fuel prices and the cost of maintaining its Boeing 747-200s. El Al stated it would cut its fleet to 26 aircraft from 31 by selling six of its 747-200s and two Boeing 757s and replacing them with one Boeing 777 and two 747-400 cargo planes. The airline also called on the government of Israel to underwrite its "exceptional" security costs, to the tune of $50 million per year.

The Toronto-Tel Aviv route has been hit hard by the security situation in Israel, with booking in April dropping by 40 percent over the year before, Morais said. Partly empty Tel Aviv-bound flights have been redirected to New York where American passengers are taken on board. The move makes the trans-Atlantic flight more cost-efficient for the airline, but it has added 1.5 hours to each leg of the journey.

Morais was optimistic the new arrangement involving Los Angeles would improve El Al's bottom line in Canada. "If everything goes as planned, it should be to our benefit," he said.

In the past, El Al has complained it was at a disadvantage vis-a-vis Air Canada, its main competitor on the Toronto-Tel Aviv route. The Canadian carrier was using Toronto as a hub, bringing in American passengers and topping up the flight with Canadian travelers.

That situation irked El Al and led to tough negotiations between Israel and Canada on landing rights between the countries. In the last round of talks, Canada, in exchange for obtaining the rights to 21 weekly flights to Israel, agreed to give Israel "fifth freedom" rights, allowing El Al to originate flights elsewhere and fill them in Toronto. But without U.S. approval of the same arrangement, the Canadian rights had no practical effect.

United States-Israel negotiations subsequently gave Israel fifth freedom rights from that country as well, paving the way for adoption of the Los Angeles-Toronto-Tel Aviv route. As an added bonus for the airline, El Al will be able to offer flights to and from Los Angeles, without any ties to an Israeli destination.

Morais said El Al's Canadian passengers will experience several benefits. El Al will be able to offer more weekly flights to Israel, flights that depart in the evening as opposed to mid afternoon, and non-stop flights, instead of being routed through New York.

"If the Los Angeles promotion succeeds, we'll be stronger here," Morais said.

"With the restructuring, El Al is highly committed to maintaining the Canada-Tel Aviv route, as we have for 30 years," Morais added.

Josephus: Roman or Jew?

Sunday, May 6, 2001 – 3:00 p.m.

Louis H. Feldman (Yeshiva University)
"Josephus and the Bible"

Tessa Rajak (University of Reading, England)
"Josephus in the Diaspora"

Once a celebrated, young military leader in the Judean Revolt against Rome, Josephus Flavius became a turncoat. Later living in exile in Rome, he wrote accounts of the wars in which he had fought and the history of the people to which he belonged. But which people was really his, the Jews or the Romans? Professors Feldman and Rajak will address that question and others in this symposium on Josephus, whose life in two worlds foreshadows some burning questions of contemporary Jewish life.

The lectures will take place in the Glendon Dining Hall, Glendon Campus, of York University, 2275 Bayview Avenue. (Parking in the upper lot, near the hall.)

The Wolinsky Lectures are sponsored by the Centre for Jewish Studies, the Faculty of Arts, and the Faculty of Education of York University in cooperation with the Toronto Board of Jewish Education. Inquiries: Tel: 416-736-5823; Fax: 416-736-5344; Email: michaelb@yorku.ca

Day mutiny will yield aftershocks

Often, violent, stormy weather or other natural phenomena are so forceful in their raw power they simply leave us breathless. That is pretty much how Ottawa watchers felt as they observed the sudden (except in hindsight) implosion of the Canadian Alliance.

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

But just like chaos theory's butterfly in Japan scenario (you know, where the flutter caused by the butterfly in Japan affects the weather in South America), readers can be sure that the aftershocks of the Day Mutiny will be felt by all parties in the House.

A bold prediction: within 18 months, every party represented in the House of Commons will have a new leader – including the reigning Liberals. Here's why.

One can pretty much say goodnight to Day. He was dealt a massive and ultimately fatal blow when party icons like Deborah Grey and Chuck Strahl abandoned ship. His fate was sealed when a plea to Manning for a public endorsement fell on deaf ears. The only reason Day will be around for the next eight to 10 months is that would-be successors have not yet had the time to recruit funding and support for a leadership bid. But they will, including Deborah Grey.

Scrutiny of leaders is contagious. Joe Clark's aggressive attempt to increase his profile while skewering the prime minister has failed. The Tories are adrift and so impotent that they cannot even exploit the troubles plaguing their right-of-centre sister party. Clark's gambit has yielded no results, and those few influential Tories who stave off party bankruptcy have run out of patience. Pressure to recruit a younger, more dynamic leader who can help to truly unite the right and still retain core Tory principles will grow. People like Peter McKay will not stick around forever without reasonable prospects for achieving some success.

Leadership fever is sure to spread to the New Democrats and the Bloc Québécois as well. In the tumult of the Quebec Summit, few noticed the significant number of NDP elite who travelled to that beautiful city. Even if they had noticed, it was only natural that New Democrats would join anti-globalization protests. But for many NDPers, the real reason for their presence in Quebec was to meet quietly with former leader Ed Broadbent to plan a "party renewal" (a universal code word in politics for a leadership change). As for the BQ, everyone is tired of Gilles Duceppe's Marxist-Leninist approach to politics. Now that the BQ has been cemented as a permanent fixture on the federal map (to protect Quebec interests of course), the BQ will want a leader with whom Quebecers can identify.

But the one most shaken by the Day mutiny was Prime Minister Jean Chrétien. It reminded him of how quickly things can change in politics. Expect a "walk in the snow" the next time snow falls in Shawinigan. The prime minister knows that nothing cramps a legacy more than being ousted from power by one's own.

Ceasefire, peace talks back on the agenda

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Palestinians offered Israel a ceasefire proposal on Sunday under which diplomatic negotiations would resume four weeks after the ceasefire was declared.

The offer was made through Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, who met with Foreign Minister Shimon Peres in Cairo.

Mubarak announced after the meeting that the ceasefire deal had been accepted, but both Peres and Egyptian Foreign Minister Amr Moussa later stressed that it had only been discussed.

Peres also told Mubarak of Israel's reservations about a Jordanian-Egyptian proposal to restart Israeli-Palestinian talks. Peres then flew to Jordan to discuss the reservations with King Abdullah. Peres also gave both leaders a letter from Prime Minister Ariel Sharon saying that Israel would like to resume negotiations, but cannot do so while violence continues.

Afterward, Peres said one of the main achievements of the meetings was Mubarak's accepting the principle that there would be no negotiations under fire.

Speaking at their joint press conference, Mubarak noted that the Palestinians are also unwilling to negotiate under fire.

Regarding Israel's reservations about the Jordanian-Egyptian negotiating proposal, Israeli sources said the reception they got was better than they expected. In an interview published in Al-Hayat Sunday morning, Jordanian Prime Minister Ali Abu al-Ragheb had expressed complete opposition to any changes in the plan. But an Israeli source said the Jordanians actually accepted many of Israel's reservations.

"We are ready to listen [to proposed changes] if the Israelis mean business and want to change the situation on the ground and take advantage of the opportunity to create the right conditions for a resumption of negotiations," a Jordanian minister added.

However, the Jordanians were apparently unwilling to compromise on what Israel considers one of the most problematic items – a clause stipulating an absolute freeze on construction in the settlements. Israel has said it will not build any new settlements, but insists on the right to accommodate "natural growth" in existing ones.

Mubarak declined to comment publicly on Israel's reservations, saying he needed to discuss them with Jordan first. But Israeli sources said Egypt was more open than Jordan to Jerusalem's suggestions. They noted that Moussa spoke about the need to honour existing agreements between Israel and the Palestinian Authority – the same formula Peres had suggested as a basis for negotiations.

At his meetings with both Mubarak and Abdullah, Peres stressed that Israel is only willing to resume negotiations on the basis of signed agreements. It will not accept a Palestinian demand that talks resume from the point at which they broke off in Taba prior to the Israeli election in February. The understandings reached in Taba, if any, were never formalized into a written document.

Senior Palestinian officials, however, continued to insist Sunday that they would not accept any changes in the Egyptian-Jordanian proposal. And several leading Palestinians also expressed skepticism about any ceasefire proposal. Marwan Barghouti, the head of the Tanzim militias in the West Bank, for instance, said he had not heard of any ceasefire initiative, but that in any case, the intifadah would continue "as long as the occupation of Palestinian lands continues."

Peres also used his joint press conference with Mubarak to announce that Israel would take "unconditional, immediate steps to facilitate the life of the people in the territories in every possible way." One of these steps is an increase in the number of Palestinians permitted to work inside Israel.

After a brief stop in Israel Sunday night to brief Sharon on the result of his talks, Peres flew to the United States, where he will ask the George Bush administration to step up its involvement in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and to grant diplomatic and economic backing to efforts to reach a ceasefire.

He will also meet with the president of the World Bank to present his proposal for the economic rehabilitation of the territories and the establishment of economic joint ventures between Israel and the Palestinian Authority.

Sharon calls transfer of land 'irrevocable'

By DALIA SHEHORI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said Sunday that the lesson to be learned from allowing land to come under full Palestinian control, such as Area A in the territories, is that such transfers are "irrevocable."

Speaking during the weekly cabinet meeting, Sharon said: "My starting point is that we must be very careful when it comes to transferring territory and [before we do so] we must see serious change in the relationship [with the Palestinian Authority] because all the lands [that we transfer to the Palestinians] are lands that are not coming back."

The prime minister made no mention of or direct reference to the mini-invasion of Gaza two weeks ago, an incident that turned into a domestic and international fiasco. However, ministers present at the meeting clearly understood that he was referring to a lesson he had learned from the experience.

Sharon was also responding to criticism from National Infrastructure Minister Avigdor Lieberman (Yisrael Beitenu), who said that "we must bring under our control" every location from which shots are fired at a Jewish town.

Lieberman said the Palestinian neighbourhood of Beit Jala, from which shots are often fired against the Jerusalem neighbourhood of Gilo, "must be liberated."

Sharon emphasized that he was sticking to his policy of refusing to negotiate with the Palestinians under fire. "When there is shooting, there will be no talking and no concessions. When there is no shooting, clearly there will also be talking," he said.

He backed his argument by saying that he made this stance clear in conversations with U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell and President George Bush.

Western media lack broad Mideast perspective

In his National Post article of April 25, in which he described anti-Israel and anti-Semitic rhetoric streaming from a two-day Tehran conference in support of the Palestinians, Peter Goodspeed mentioned the fact that Iraq boycotted the meeting as a "protest" over Iran's firing 56 Scud missiles into Iraq a week earlier. Iran's target was the People's Mujahideen Organization, an Iranian opposition group based in Iraq.

Until Goodspeed's mention of this Iran-Iraq incident, it appears that there had been no report of it anywhere in the Canadian media, highlighting a problem: a lack of attention to important events that occur in the Arab/Muslim Middle East unrelated to Israel.

The attack took place on April 18, but a search of the North American media reveals that on April 19 the Orlando Sentinel was the only paper to mention it, and then only as a brief news digest item. Not even the New York Times saw fit to report on it.

Foreign editors might argue that cross-border attacks between the Mujahideen and Iranian forces are nothing new and therefore not "newsworthy." But 56 Scud missiles in one day? Isn't that newsworthy?

Goodspeed observes that "Despite [Tehran's] angry rhetoric, the conference highlighted deep divisions within the Arab and Muslim communities overMiddle East peace." These divisions are not just over Middle East peace but, beyond the Tehran conference, over the Middle East in general – deep divisions in which the Western media, with few exceptions, seem singularly uninterested. Yet these are divisions that fill out the picture of what is happening in that volatile region, and which deserve and need attention.

Tehran and the Arab world's obsession with Israel bring to mind something the Lebanese-born scholar, Fouad Ajami, wrote in the aftermath of the Persian Gulf War: "There is no way of knowing whether the Arabs would have fared brilliantly had they looked at their troubles squarely in the eye. But the Arabs looked away. For there was always that great alibi of modern Arab politics: Israel and the Palestinians."

There is no denying the necessity of finding a solution for the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, but at the same time a broader perspective needs to be given by the western media to developments in the region as a whole. Only part of the inattention can be attributed to the issue of access: the absence of a large media presence in many of the closed Arab and Muslim Middle East states, relative to the huge media presence in Israel. A larger part goes to the heart of western cultural attitudes which tend to fixate on all things Jewish and Israeli and to hold Israel to a far higher standard than is applied to the Arab/Muslim world.

memory of the Jewish victims, on July 10, 2001, 60 years to the day after the massacre," Rabbi Poupko noted.

At the close of the ceremony on the now empty site, the students read from a list of Jedwabne's Jewish victims, and survivor Myer Schondorf recited the Kaddish. The students also placed stones on the site of the massacre, in remembrance of Jedwabne's victims.

"In Judaism, the greatest good you can do for someone else is called 'chesed shel emet' or 'true kindness,' the type of kindness without any compensation or hope of reward from the one you are providing the kindness to," Rabbi Poupko told the group. "This kindness is untainted by selfishness, and is usually associated with our efforts on behalf of the departed.

"You are the first group to visit Jedwabne and to recognize the truth of their deaths," he continued. "You are practising true kindness when you mark the true nature of the deaths."

Speaking with tears in his eyes, Rabbi Poupko discussed the lives of Jedwabne's Jews before the war, so that "we honour their life before we mark their deaths."

He mentioned the custom of Jedwabne's young children, who would gather around the crib of a newborn to recite the Shema shortly after the baby's birth. He told the story of the ba'al agallah (wagon driver) who had saved a Polish pilot from Soviet hands. In return, the perpetrators of the massacre offered to spare his life. The wagon driver refused, saying he did not "want his life given to him by murderers." Before he died, he recited the Shema with Jedwabne's rabbi, then entered the barn where many of Jedwabne's Jews were burned alive.

"But," the rabbi noted, "we come here not to feel anger, but to learn the truth, to educate ourselves, to feel the uniqueness of Jewish life that once existed here and to reinforce our pride in our Jewish identity."

Following the ceremony, local citizens from Jedwabne came to speak to the group. One of them spoke to Jack Dym, the chair of the Montreal group: "Please don't come to Jedwabne in anger. I was born after the war. The people who carried out this atrocity were prosecuted and condemned. Please don't think that all Poles are like that."

"We come to Poland to mourn the loss of so many of our people – the artists, the musicians, the scientists – who would have made enormous contributions to the world. It's not just our loss, it's a loss to humanity," Dym responded.

"We don't come out of hate or bitterness, but to search for the truth, to educate, to build bridges, to create a better world."

LEGAL NOTICE BY ORDER OF THE COURT

The plan to distribute the $1.25 billion Swiss Banks legal settlement has been approved. This notice describes the claims process.

The United States Court that approved the proposed Settlement between Holocaust Survivors and Swiss Banks has now approved the "Plan of Allocation" to distribute the money. If you already submitted an Initial Questionnaire, you will automatically get a claim form or information about the claims process in the mail. There is no cost to submit a claim.

If you were persecuted by the Nazi Regime because you were or were believed to be Jewish, Romani, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual, or physically or mentally disabled or handicapped, you may be in one of the first five groups below. The sixth group, Slave Labor II Claims, is not limited to these "Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution."

*1. Deposited Assets Claims - If you had assets deposited with any Swiss bank, investment fund or other custodian prior to May 9, 1945 and your claim is approved, you will receive payment. A list of names is available to help you determine your eligibility. You can submit a claim even if your name is not on the list. Certain heirs of original depositors are also eligible.

*2. Slave Labor I Claims - If you performed forced or slave labor anywhere for an entity which operated under Nazi authority, you are eligible for payment. Certain heirs of former laborers who died after February 15, 1999 are eligible.

*3. Looted Assets Group - Because all survivors had assets taken by the Nazis, there is no claims process for this group. Instead, needy survivors may be eligible for services such as food packages, medical assistance and emergency cash grants to be distributed through Court-approved humanitarian relief programs.

*4. Refugee Claims - If you plausibly demonstrate that, while seeking to avoid Nazi persecution, you were denied entry into or expelled from Switzerland, or admitted into Switzerland as a refugee but were detained, mistreated or abused, you will receive payment. A partial list of names is available. You can submit a claim even if your name is not on the list. Certain heirs of refugees who died after February 15, 1999 are eligible.

*5. Swiss Insurance Claims - The Court has approved a claims process to resolve any Nazi-era insurance claim you have involving Swiss Reinsurance Company, Swiss Life Insurance and Pension Company, and certain affiliates. You may exclude yourself solely from the insurance provisions of the Settlement, if you act before August 5, 2001. If you do not exclude yourself, you will be bound by the insurance provisions of the Settlement.

*6. Slave Labor II Claims - If you plausibly demonstrate that you performed slave labor anywhere for a Swiss-run company appearing on a list issued by the Court, you will receive payment. Certain heirs of former slave laborers who died after February 15, 1999 are eligible.

There were also improvements and amendments to the Settlement Agreement, including: artwork looted during the Nazi era may be recovered in certain situations; and a list of names in Swiss Bank files relating to accounts that possibly belonged to victims of Nazi persecution has been published.

A Mission to Germany, the Czech Republic, Poland and Israel

C·A·N·A·D·A ISRAEL Experience.com

This June join a group of thirty Canadian university-age participants on a journey designed to witness our past and experience our future. For over a decade, the Anguish to Hope program has provided hundreds of Canadian Jewish students with the opportunity to witness the remnants of the rich Jewish life that existed in pre-World War Two Europe. This year Anguish to Hope participants will be exposed to our rich heritage in Germany, the Czech Republic and Poland. They will also become witnesses to the remains of the horror of the Death Camps in these three countries. From Europe participants will travel to Israel, where they will have an opportunity to reflect on their experience in Berlin, Prague and Poland while exploring their connection to the promise and joy of the Jewish State.

Highlights of the June 2001 program include: Touring in Berlin; The Neue Synagogue; Judisches Museum; Sachsenhausen-Orianienburg Concentration Camp; The Site of Wannsee Conference; Prague; Josefov (the Jewish Quarter of Prague); Theresienstadt; Krakow; The Rama Synagogue; Shabbat in Krakow; Auschwitz; Warsaw's Gensha Cemetery; The Warsaw Ghetto; Shabbat in Jerusalem; The Western Wall; Sunrise atop Massada; Floating in the Dead Sea; Touring in the Upper and Lower Galilee; Sleeping under the stars at a Bedouin Camp in the Negev Desert; Relaxing at the Ein Gedi Oasis; Tel Aviv; Hiking in the Golan Heights.

Anguish to Hope is led by two Canadian program leaders, an Israeli tour educator, a survivor of the Shoah and additional specialists. There are thirty spots for participants on this year's program. Applicants will be accepted to the program on a first-come first-served basis according to when their preliminary application and deposit are received.

Israel out of Lebanon: One year later

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Last spring, Israel withdrew from its self-declared security zone in southern Lebanon, weary of a grinding military engagement that had cost the lives of more than 1,000 Israeli soldiers since the late 1960s.

With the first anniversary of Israel's May 24 unilateral pullout approaching, southern Lebanon remains what it has been for the past three decades: a tense, potentially explosive tinderbox.

On April 14, Israel's nemesis, Hezbollah, which effectively drove the Israeli army out of Lebanon in a successful guerrilla war, touched off another round of fighting in the disputed Shabaa Farms district (Har Dov), where the borders of Israel, Lebanon and Syria converge.

In line with its campaign to evict Israel from Shabaa Farms, Hezbollah fired Sagger missiles at an Israeli tank, killing an Israeli soldier, the third to fall since Israel's retreat from Lebanon.

By way of response, Israel shelled Hezbollah positions, and, in an unmistakable warning to Syria, Hezbollah's patron, bombed a Syrian radar station in the Bekaa Valley, the first Israeli strike against a Syrian target in five years.

In the wake of the bombing, an uneasy calm settled over Shabaa Farms, a hilly area approximately 17 kilometres in length and two to five kilometres in width. Lying in the scenic foothills of Mt. Hermon, the highest peak in the region, Shabaa Farms was occupied by Israel during the 1967 Six Day War.

Now claimed by Lebanon, Shabaa Farms is, in fact, on the Golan Heights and thus technically part of Syria, according to the United Nations. Before Israel pulled its forces out of Lebanon precipitously in May, thereby complying with UN Resolution 425, the United Nations ruled that the Shabaa Farms dispute should be resolved by Israel and Syria in direct talks.

However, due to the breakdown of Israel's negotiations with Syria 16 months ago, the Shabaa Farms problem has festered, and Hezbollah has taken full advantage of this dangerous situation.

Lebanon, weak and beholden to Syria, would prefer to reclaim Shabaa Farms by diplomatic means. But since the Lebanese government cannot or will not assert its authority in southern Lebanon, Hezbollah, with Syria's tacit approval, has filled the vacuum. Syria regards Hezbollah as a useful surrogate, using it to exert pressure on Israel to relinquish the Golan Heights.

After Israel's sudden withdrawal from its security enclave, Hezbollah encouraged Lebanese civilians, particularly Palestinians from refugee camps, to throw stones and firebombs at Israeli soldiers manning border posts and at farmers working adjacent fields.

These incidents, though troubling and symptomatic of Lebanon's inability or unwillingness to fulfil its national responsibilities as a government, resulted in the injuries of several Israeli soldiers and civilians.

Israel exercised restraint in reacting to these daily provocations, which more or less petered out toward the close of last summer. By the autumn of 2000, however, Israel faced a far more ominous development – cross-border infiltration probes in Shabaa Farms mounted by radical Palestinian factions and Hezbollah, which is backed by Iran.

In one such incident in October, Hezbollah kidnapped three Israeli soldiers, and then abducted an Israeli businessman in Europe believed to have ties with the Mossad, Israel's external intelligence agency.

Since these abductions, Hezbollah has upped the ante. On Nov. 26, Hezbollah detonated a roadside bomb near the border fence, killing an Israeli soldier, the first to die since Israel's withdrawal. On Feb. 16, an Israeli soldier was mortally wounded when a Hezbollah rocket struck his patrol vehicle.

Israel reacted to these attacks with measured counter-strikes in the immediate vicinity, but when a third Israeli soldier was killed last month, Israel changed the rules by attacking the Syrian radar base. Israel, therefore, has served notice on Syria that it will pay a price if it continues to support Hezbollah operations. It seems clear that Syria can no longer act with impunity in southern Lebanon.

Crepes, fajitas or wraps — blintzes for Shavuot

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Later this month, Jews will celebrate the holiday of Shavuot, the time when God gave us the Torah at Mount Sinai. It is also called Chag Habikurim, the holiday of the first fruits. In ancient times, people brought the best of the first harvest to the Temple in Jerusalem.

Shavuot is a very happy festival. One of the best parts is that we get to eat a lot of dairy foods, especially blintzes, which are really yummy.

Many other cultures make something like blintzes. Some call them crepes, or fajitas or wraps, but they are really just fancy names for blintzes, that wonderful concoction of thin pancakes stuffed with sweetened cheese or fruit, and slathered in sour cream.

If you like blintzes (and who doesn't?), you will enjoy a new book that just came out, A Mountain of Blintzes, by Barbara Diamond Goldin, with illustrations by Anik McGrory (Harcourt, 2001).

The book is based on an old story about people in the town of Chelm, in Poland, where most of the people were very silly indeed. In A Mountain of Blintzes, Sarah and Max worked very hard to run a farm and to raise their family. "They fed the chickens, chopped the wood, planted the fields and took in boarders to earn some extra money."

Unfortunately, "no matter what, Sarah and Max never seemed to have enough," even though the children tried to help all they could.

When Shavuot was coming near, Sarah and Max wanted some blintzes very badly, but they had no money to buy the flour, cheese and other things that they would need. They decided (well, actually Sarah decided and Max went along with it) to do some work for the neighbours, to make extra money.

Max helped Mr. Epstein paint some new bungalows he was building, and Sarah washed Mrs. Grossinger's sheets. The idea was that they would each put the money they earned into a box, and they would soon have enough to make blintzes.

That was all very well until it came time to actually put the money into the box. Sarah was just going to drop her coins in, when "a brilliant idea hit her." She realized that with Max putting his money in, there would be enough for the blintzes, and she could use the money for candles and new clothes for the children.

When Max came home, he too "was struck by an idea such as a genius might have." You guessed it. He figured that if Sarah was putting in her coins, they wouldn't need his money for the blintzes – he could use his money for wine and for new shoes for the children.

Well, what do you think happened? That's right – when they opened the box, there was no money in it at all. Luckily, their children loved blintzes too, and loved helping the family. They also did extra work around town, but they kept all the money and gave it to their parents for blintzes.

Because the family all worked (even if not together), they managed to have mountain of blintzes, together with "a mountain of other good things – candles and wine, not to mention new clothes and shoes for the children."

FRENCH-TOASTED BLINTZES

1 loaf sliced challah
1½ lbs. cottage cheese (not curd cheese)
salt and pepper to taste
½ cup sugar (or to taste)
⅓ cup sour cream
6 eggs, well beaten
1 tsp. vanilla (if you feel like it)

Cut crusts off bread slices. Take a rolling pin, and roll the bread slices until they are very thin and flat.

Mix the cheese, salt and pepper, sugar and sour cream in a small bowl.

Spread about a tablespoon of the cheese mixture thinly on the bread. Fold one side of the bread over the cheese, and bring the opposite side on top. Press down so that the package sticks.

Dip the cheese and bread packages first into the milk and then into the eggs. Melt margarine in a large skillet and fry the packages until they are golden brown. Put them in a large foil pan in neat rows. Spoon a little sour cream in thin lines over the blintzes.

If you are going to serve them right away, put them in the oven at 350 and heat them up for about 10 minutes. Take them out carefully (the pan will be hot). Serve with more sour cream.

You can also put them in the freezer, and thaw them when you are ready to serve them.

Based on I Samuel 16:1-16:13 and the Midrash

Samuel the prophet walked along the dusty road to Bethlehem. In his hand he carried a hollowed out ram's horn filled with oil. Saul, the present king of Israel, had disobeyed God. It was time to choose his successor. God had told Samuel to find a man named Yishai (Jesse), and ask to see his sons. One of them was destined to be the next king.

But officially Saul was still king, and he and his supporters would be very upset if they found out Samuel was appointing a new king. They might even kill him. So Samuel had to keep his mission secret. Along with the horn of oil, he led a young calf. . . .

As Samuel approached Bethlehem, he glanced at the town gate, where the city's elders judged the people. They looked up, recognized him, and began worriedly whispering among themselves. They got up and quickly approached Samuel, who realized they were afraid he had come to rebuke them.

When they reached him, the chief elder said, "Are you coming on a peaceful mission?"

"Don't worry," replied Samuel. "I come in peace." He stroked the calf and explained, "I have come here to bring a sacrifice to God with Yishai and his sons."

Yishai and his sons were quickly summoned. Samuel looked as the first one, Eliav, came in. Eliav was the oldest son of Yishai, and he was tall and handsome.

"Wow," thought Samuel, "I bet he's the king God chose!" He took the horn of oil, and turned it so that it would pour on Eliav's head (that's how they appointed kings back then), but the oil wouldn't come out!

"Samuel," said God, "do not merely look at his appearance. He is not fit to be king. Man can only see what's on the outside, but God knows even what's inside of him."

For Eliav had serious temper problems.

The next son, Avinadav came in. Samuel sized him up. "He seems fit to be king," he thought, and tried to pour the oil. But again it wouldn't come out! Avinadav wasn't God's chosen king either.

Next came Shamah. No success with him either.

Samuel went through all of Yishai's six sons, but the oil remained in the horn. He turned to Yishai. "Are these all the kids you have?"

"Well . . . I have another one, but he's . . . he's not who you're looking for. He's young and impetuous. He takes care of my sheep."

"Bring him to me!"

David, the youngest of all the brothers, was brought before Samuel. Samuel looked at him, and thought, "Yishai was right. This guy looks hotheaded, even violent! He's not the sort of person God wants as king! I'm getting out of here!"

"Yes Samuel, by nature he is a violent man. But he controls himself. He will channel his passion into fighting my enemies. Get up. Anoint him! He is the next king!"

The oil gushed out by itself, flowing over David's head, anointing him as king.

One day, David would rule over Israel and conquer its enemies. His son Solomon would build the holy Temple.

But Saul was still in power. For now, David had to lie low. So did Samuel, who returned to his home in Ramah.

Business Profile

Forensic accountant finds GAAP in rules

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Back at the height of the market's steep climb, when share valuations were hitting the roof and just about every stock was rated a "strong buy," Al Rosen was sounding a cautious note.

No, make that a resoundingly negative note.

Rosen, a forensic accountant and chair of Veritas Investment Research, never accepted the corporate guidance that promised ever-expanding revenues; nor did he believe financial reports that promoted valuations like EBITDA (Earnings Before Interest, Taxes, Depreciation and Amortization), a bogus concept he believes bears no relationship to cash flow but which is employed by investment analysts when touting stocks, as if they were the hot pick at Woodbine.

Enter Veritas, an eight-month-old research boutique that provides clients with a true and unbiased evaluation of TSE companies and serves as an antidote to the corporate cheerleading Rosen believes has become endemic in the world of financial analysis.

From his perspective, a dangerous practice had taken hold in the corporate world where books are commonly cooked to overstate revenues, minimize costs and conjure the rosiest picture to boost a stock's profile.

Directors of major Canadian corporations are complicit in the subterfuge, motivated in part by the lure of options that entitle them to purchase shares at a fixed price, creating a personal benefit from overstating the corporation's financial situation.

Canada's shamefully lax regulatory environment has given directors and those he calls "crooks" virtually a free hand to manipulate a company's books, Rosen says.

Rosen is highly critical of Canada's woefully inadequate GAAP (Generally Accepted Accounting Principles), the accounting practices that were supposed to protect investors by accurately describing corporate health. They are so flawed that they prove no impediment to overly optimistic or unscrupulous corporate directors who use them to make their companies look a lot better than they are in reality. Compounding the problem is a Supreme Court of Canada decision on shareholder access to financial reports that Rosen finds "laughable" and which, he says, "allows CFOs to choose the accounting method that makes them look good."

It's that kind of stuff that clearly makes Rosen angry – but also gives Veritas an opening into the world of financial analysis.

Veritas has positioned itself as an independent research boutique that provides its clients with in-depth analysis of the financial health of selected TSE 300 corporations.

Rosen and company president Michael Palmer point out that Veritas is completely independent of the corporations they analyze, unlike brokerages and investment houses whose investment analysts have been criticized for lack of independence from their firms' finance departments.

"We're trying to find that niche of finding real value in companies," Palmer said.

Veritas does not have a trading department and it does not make, buy or sell recommendations, Palmer and Rosen say. Their business model – " a new concept on the street," according to Palmer – sees Veritas compensated for its research when clients execute trades through a specified third party, which in turn, gives a percentage of its commissions to Veritas.

Approximately $600 million a year in commissions are generated by institutional investors trading in the secondary market, Palmer said. "We think we can capture one to two percent of that commission pool."

So far, Veritas has experienced slow going in its bid to turn a profit. The work is often painstaking and time consuming, and "it takes the street time to know what we're doing," Rosen explained. "But they are curious."

Where once Rosen was a lone voice questioning the optimism that catapulted the TSE to near the 11,000 mark, today his approach is grabbing the attention of institutional investors. He's often called upon by the financial media to discuss corporate issues, he writes a regular column for Canadian Business magazine and he is an occasional contributor to the National Post.

Veritas' research and that of its forerunner, Private Financial Research Corporation, has touched on dozens of well-known TSE companies, including GEAC, Nortel, Seagram, Chapters, Leitch Technology and TLC Laser Eye Centres.

Without accurate analysis of financial statements, investing becomes "like a casino, because no one knows if a company is really profitable," Rosen says.

Al Rosen

U.S. giant Lucent, once a darling of the high-tech world, has seen its share value plummet and it has been forced to restate its books because of shoddy accounting practices, Rosen says.

Canadian corporations do not escape his scorn. They have been exposed for reporting as revenue inventory that was delivered but was unsold and might have been returned, for amortizing goodwill over decades when the benefits usually expired after two or three years and for other questionable practices, he says.

Rosen's advocacy of shareholder rights clearly exposes an idealistic streak that belies his reserved manner.

"What motivates us is that a democratic society only exists if it protects private property," he says. The institutions of society, including the Supreme Court of Canada, securities regulators and the accounting profession (by failing to keep GAAP up to date with current business practices) have let down Canadian investors, Rosen maintains.

Compounding the problem is that accounting students are not being properly taught, so that "the crooks are years ahead of the average auditor. Young people are not being trained to spot these things."

Someone has to protect private property, Rosen adds. Without that protection, investors will sink their money into companies they believe are financially sound but whose books are completely unreliable, he suggests.

The repercussions of that echo through the capital markets, reducing their efficiency and drawing funds to companies that would normally be shunned by investors. That makes the cost of capital higher than it should be, "as capital is going to the scam artists," Rosen says.

Formerly head of forensic accounting at Mintz & Partners, Rosen has worked on more than 300 negligence cases. He has headed the accounting program in York University's MBA program and he has constantly lobbied to improve accounting courses to keep up with changes in business.

Rosen's forensic accounting experience gave him insight into the manipulation of financial statements by crooks and other ne'er do-wells.

Although something of a gadfly in the accounting profession, he and Veritas must be doing something right.

"One guy called up and said he wanted better training to be a crook!" Rosen says.

Two docs by Karen Shopsowitz airing on TV next week

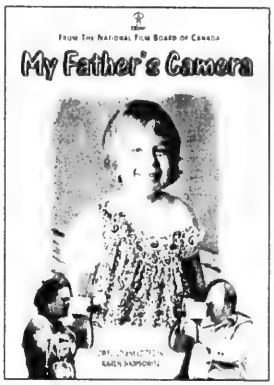
By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Toronto filmmaker Karen Shopsowitz brings her finely-honed talents to two documentaries scheduled to be aired on Vision TV and TVOntario next week.

I Am A Rose: A Father's Journey, a poignant documentary to be broadcast by Vision TV on Thursday, May 10 at 9 p.m., celebrates the life of Stacey Levitt, a budding Toronto poet who died under tragic circumstances in 1995. She was only 18.

Five months after returning from a mountain climbing expedition in Mexico, Stacey was struck by a car and killed while jogging near her home.

In 1996, in an unusually touching and courageous gesture, Stacey's father, Ned, went to Mexico to climb Mt. Ixta. Due to inclement weather, Stacey had been unable to reach the 17,000-foot summit.



The one-hour film, buttressed by excerpts from her journal, poetry and clips from her 1990 bat mitzvah, turns on Ned's ascent of Mt. Ixta, a treacherous peak near Mexico City.

By all accounts, Stacey was a remarkable teenager, a sensitive poet as well as an ardent sportswoman.

Apart from drawing a lively pen portrait of Stacey, I Am A Rose focuses on Ned's resolve to honour his late daughter by finishing the climb for her.

"She wanted to climb that mountain more than anything else," says Ned, a lawyer.

Assisted by a guide, Ned and his brother got to the top. Having conquered the mountain on Stacey's behalf, Ned wept like a baby. "She would have loved it up here," he muses. "So beautiful. So peaceful."

On Mt. Ixta, he placed a blue box containing I Am A Rose, a book of her poetry, and a journal in which fellow climbers could write comments. Judging by the film, the box has attracted quite a bit of attention from empathetic mountaineers.

Ned's conquest of Mt. Ixta assuaged his grief, but not his pain. Six years after Stacey's fatal accident, her family remains overwhelmed by her passing. I Am A Rose may salve the terrible wound.

On Wednesday, May 9 at 10 p.m., and then again on Sunday, May 13 at midnight, TV Ontario presents Shopsowitz's other film, My Father's Camera, which is nostalgic and educational.

Basically a potted history of the home movie – which dates back to the late 19th century – My Father's Camera revolves around her late father, Israel Shopsowitz, a noted restaurateur (Shopsy's delicatessen) who had a passion for amateur filmmaking.

He bought his first movie camera as a high school student, and spent the next few decades filming family events and festivities from birthday parties and beach vacations, to a daughter's bat mitzvah.

In addition to family clips featuring her parents, grandparents, sister and herself, My Father's Camera traces the development of the home movie from its quaint debut in France in 1895, to its mass marketing by George Eastman in the 1920s.

Using Israel's Super 8 camera, she visits a town in Maine with North America's largest collection of home movies. There she interviews academics and film buffs who explain the beloved genre.

Peter Forgacs, an authority she consults, aptly calls the home movie "a gate to time."

The archival footage in My Father's Camera, some shot by Israel, is deliciously rich and textured.

Footage includes Hollywood comedian Groucho Marx, minus his walrus mustache, mugging for the camera. Jazz musician and composer Duke Ellington plays the piano. The British royal couple visit Toronto in 1939. Ku Klux Klan members, attired in white robes, march in a parade. News of the 1946 Nuremberg trials in Germany flashes across an electronic billboard in Manhattan.

Home movies, she reminds us, freeze fleeting lives. This, essentially, is the allure of My Father's Camera.

Textile artist Heller takes her show on the road

By RUTH WEINSTOCK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Bedecked in sequins and glitz, Lynne Heller used to win applause across Canadian stages years ago as a dancer with the Ontario Ballet Theatre and other troupes.

An injury brought that career to an end in 1987. But the plaudits haven't stopped. The slender, dark-eyed Torontonian has since become renowned on quite a different stage — the international textile art scene.

The hardworking artist is in high gear, preparing for a May 25 opening in a highly regarded gallery located on Canyon Road in Santa Fe, N.M. The Thirteen Moons gallery has featured the biggest names in textile art. Heller's work will be on exhibit in the centre of Santa Fe's "art alley" until June 21 – quite a coup for any quilter.

Torontonians will be able to preview Heller's solo exhibition before it's shipped southwest. The Rebecca Gallery, 317 Grace St. near Harbord, is showing her work until May 13.

Heller enjoys experimenting with — and departing from — quilting traditions, which she confesses at one time felt like a "straightjacket" to her.

"Quilters can be obsessed with perfecting technique, making straight lines and square corners," she commented. "But you can't deny that fabric moves, puckers, frays and tears, by trying to make it appear straight and square. Instead of doing battle with the material, I let it lead."

The results are softly coloured artworks that suggest human fragility. The textile pieces speak of lives barely held together, of attempts to stitch over the gaps and holes that time and circumstance rend and tear in the fabric of being.

Quilt by Lynne Heller

Not surprisingly for artwork created by a former dancer, the hangings are also animated with movement. Heller piles coloured squares of silk, linen, cotton, wool and synthetics in layers, positioning them so that they caper rhythmically across the surface. Then she cuts open, or parts the layers, to suggest interior depth. Metallic fibres catch and bounce the light, emphasizing activity.

The handstitched textile pieces range in size from 10 by 6 inches to 4 by 6 inches and sell for between $220 and $2,600 (US).

Heller's art career has had many high points. In 1998, one of two exhibitions she did in Havana, Cuba, was opened by the Canadian ambassador. She won acclaim at the "Oscars" of quilting, an international competition, which takes place in Athens, Ohio.

The "Quilt National" jury selected Heller's dramatic red and blue work from a field of 1,230 candidates in May 1995. Heller's winning entry was included in a 20-city tour across the United States and was featured as the frontispiece in the internationally distributed Quilt National book that year.

Recognition came in the summer of 1994 from Japan's fourth International Textile Competition in Kyoto. There, Heller's hand-stitched work was one of 78 finalists selected by Italian, Australian, English and Japanese jurors from 1,159 submissions from 38 countries. After the show, the Canadian Embassy in Tokyo kept one for its permanent collection.

American and English fibre-art magazines have published Heller's articles on using computer-generated designs for textile art and she has been a sought-after workshop leader on both sides of the Canadian-U.S. border.

Heller is also well known in the Toronto textile art community as one of the movers and shakers behind several large collaborative works produced for charity.

As many as 100 needleworkers have volunteered their time to make quilts and banners for such venues as Princess Margaret Hospital's breast cancer clinic, the AIDS hospice, Casey House and Interval House, a shelter for battered women.

Opening night at the Rebecca Gallery is May 3, 6:30 to 9 p.m. 416-537-8213. Open daily except Monday. Or visit the virtual gallery at www.lynneheller.com/found.

Rich musical trove of the Sephardim

The Sons of Sepharad weave vibrant music.

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Three leading singers of Sephardi music will perform at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue on May 10 at 8 p.m., in a night full of vibrant melodies.

Sons of Sepharad will feature Aaron Bensoussan, Gerard Edery and Alberto Mizrahi. The three musicians will take the audience on a voyage in the Sephardic music genre, with old and new songs in Ladino, Greek,Turkish, Arabic, Hebrew and other languages passed down from the Golden Age of Spain.

Bensoussan, one of the few masters of both Sephardi and Ashkenaz cantorial styles, was born in Morocco. Along with his well-honed tenor voice, he is also a virtuoso player of the oud (Middle Eastern lute) with its invigorating oriental rhythms and improvisations.

Edery, a classical trained baritone was also born in Morocco. With his gifted guitar playing and his immense repertoire of Judeo-Spanish songs, Edery infuses modern harmonies into complex elaborations of traditional music.

Born in Greece, Mizrahi is recognized as one of the world's finest cantors. His background encompases Greek and Turkish liturgy.

Renowned oudist George Mgrdichian and percussionist Rex Benincasa will provide the instrumental beats.

"We are delighted to present this unique musical experience that brings together all the cultural elements of the community," says Marty Wolfe, chair of the music committee at Beth Emeth Bais Yehudah Synagogue.

Proceeds from Sons of Sepharad will go to The Music Fund, founded in memory of Ruth Kelman. General admission is $25. Donations from patrons to grand benefactors range from $100 to $1,000. For information or tickets call 416-633-3838.

Koffler brings in top violinist

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In one of its biggest projects to date, the Koffler School of Music is presenting violinist Shlomo Mintz in concert at the Toronto Centre for the Arts.

Adrienne Cohen, the director of the music school, said that bringing Mintz and conductor Fabio Mastrangelo together in the upcoming concert will lend tremendous credibility to the school as a serious music centre.

Mintz, an internationally renowned violinist, made his concert debut at age 11 with the Israel Philharmonic. By 16, he had made his Carnegie Hall debut.

After winning numerous awards and establishing himself as a well respected violinist, Mintz also pursued a successful career as a conductor.

From 1989 to 1993, Mintz served as music adviser to the Israel Chamber Orchestra. Under his artistic leadership, the ICO broadened its repertoire, added new concert series and attracted many new players. Mintz also expanded the orchestra's activities outside Israel, leading the ensemble on several tours of Europe and North America.

Shlomo Mintz

His work as a teacher makes him an excellent role model for the Koffler School of Music. Mintz gives master classes in the Manhattan School of Music, the Cleveland Institute and the Paris Conservatory.

He is also patron of the Keshet Eilon International Violin Mastercourse in Israel – an advanced-level summer program for young and talented violinists from all over the world who join together to study music in Israel.

Fabio Mastrangelo will conduct the Virtuosi di Toronto and Mintz in an evening featuring the music of Mendelssohn, Mozart and Tchaikovsky.

Mastrangelo, who is also internationally regarded, has recently performed in Morocco, Japan, France and Russia.

He has worked with the Jewish Community Centre on several projects. This past fall, Mastrangelo was the music director of Ani Maamin, based on text by Elie Wiesel and music by Darius Milhaud.

The upcoming concert with Mintz will represent the joining of the Jewish and Italian communities in a cultural arena once again, Cohen said.

"This concert, which allows us to collaborate with other musical groups in the city, reflects the multicultural nature of our city," she said.

"It also establishes Koffler as an important centre for learning and listening to music."

Children from the Suzuki program at the Koffler School of Music will perform in the lobby, and there will be a post-concert dinner sponsored by Dorothy and Irving Shoichet.

For further information about the May 13 Mother's Day concert, call 416-636-1880, ext. 228, or 416-538-9879.

Foundation fights for cure to Canavan's disease

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's a good day when losing your keys or spilling your coffee makes you frantic, says Ellen Schwartz.

It means putting things in perspective when you are coping with a child with Canavan's disease, a genetic, neurodegenerative disease that most of us haven't heard of.

Nearly four years ago, Ellen and Jeff Schwartz had a son, Jacob. Concerned that he didn't seem to be meeting developmental milestones like lifting his head or tracking people with his eyes, they took him to their pediatrician for tests. An MRI, a CT scan, and blood and urine tests didn't show anything at first, but further urine tests, and finally a DNA test, led to the diagnosis of Canavan's disease.

He explained that Canavan is a leukodystrophy, one of a group of progressive disorders that affect the brain, spinal cord and nerves. Children with Canavan have an elevated level of the chemical n-acetylaspartic acid, which affects the production of myelin. Myelin covers the nerve cells, and acts as a conductor of signals between the brain and the nervous system.

"[Canavan's disease] doesn't allow signals from the brain to reach the proper place at the proper time," he said.

Canavan is caused by a recessive gene found in one out of 40 Ashkenazi Jews. Both parents must carry this gene for a child to have the disease.

The symptoms are tragic. Jacob cannot speak, has no trunk control and cannot hold up his head. At first he could eat, but that ability also left him, and he went from eating thick soups and purees to being fed through a gastric tube. He can hear, but his parents question whether he can see.

Until the last couple of months, Jacob was a "happy, responsive little boy," Ellen said. He loved being with people, he loved music, and smiled at funny sounds. Then, last December, he had a seizure that lasted for two hours.

"He hasn't been the same since," she said.

He lies limply in his father's or mother's arms. He cries and seems to be in pain. He seldom smiles any more. In time, Jeff said, no messages at all will get through. Jacob will probably not see his 10th birthday.

The family had two choices, Jeff said – to retreat into themselves or to go public. They decided to embark on a fundraising and educational program, "so that this doesn't happen to anyone else," he said.

At the urging of friends, family and their medical support team, they created a foundation called Jacob's Ladder, with a mandate to "provide funds for research into gene therapy and other endeavours to cure Canavan and other rare pediatric neurodegenerative diseases, and to help provide screening."

In three years, it has raised over $325,000, much of which has gone to fund an annual international research prize. It is also funding a screening study at Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children.

There is a prenatal screening test, although it is not routinely available in Canada. Like Tay-Sachs disease and familial dysautonomia, it is found mainly among Ashkenazi Jews. The Schwartzes were offered screening for Tay-Sachs. They were not offered it for Canavan.

"We want people to be screened for it. To do that, we need to educate doctors, to put information in schools and doctors offices," said Jeff.

Jacob and Ellen Schwartz

There is also a test that can be given during pregnancy, through chorionic villus sampling (CVS). If a positive diagnosis of Canavan is made, the couple can decide whether or not to continue the pregnancy.

(Dor Yeshorim, an organization that offers genetic screening for the haredi community before a shidduch is arranged, does test for Canavan's disease.)

In the meantime, the family does what it can to cope. "We take every day as it comes. We are grateful for the happy days and we cope with the trying ones," Ellen said.

As the interview ended, Jeff rocked Jacob in his arms, kissed him, and sang a simple children's song. Jacob smiled.

This year, Life Beat, an annual variety show put on by the medical community, is supporting Jacob's Ladder. It is being presented at the Premier Dance Theatre on Queen's Quay for four nights, beginning May 9, when there will also be a gala reception. Tickets for the reception are $100.

For more information, call Jacob's Ladder, 416-485-0078, fax 905-751-1174, or connect to the Web site, jacobsladder.onroad.com.

As the only Jewish facility in BC, the Louis Brier Home and Hospital has provided an exemplary standard of care for over 50 years to its 217 intermediate and extended care residents. Nestled in the heart of Vancouver, and operating as a fully accredited affiliate of the Vancouver Richmond Health Board, the Home is fulfilling its mandate to serve the social, spiritual, and long term care needs of its predominantly Jewish residents. Slated to undergo a major building expansion project, plans are now underway to accommodate an additional 80 multi level care and supportive living residents. In view of the impending retirement of the current chief executive, an exceptional opportunity now exists for the right person as . . .

Chief Executive Officer

Reporting to the Board, the Chief Executive Officer will be a skilled strategic thinker and a recognized leader in long term care services, who has an abiding commitment to the care of others. This person must have a full appreciation of the Jewish faith, its culture, and heritage and will understand its central importance within the facility. An exceptional people-person, the Chief Executive Officer's superior interpersonal skills, and practical, well-organized management style will be entrusted to extend the strong bridges which exist between the Board, staff, residents and the community who truly constitute its "family".

The ideal candidate is a decisive, competent and energetic professional with the vision to guide the growth of this progressive organization into the future and one who will enhance its role in clinical services, education and research. Knowledge of major capital projects would be a definite asset. While previous experience as a chief executive is preferred, as is an advanced degree, exceptional candidates now in search of a truly challenging opportunity to "move up" will receive serious consideration. To confidentially apply for this position, please visit the Opportunities section of our Web Site www.caldwell.ca, email to vancouver@caldwell.ca, write to 750-999 West Hastings Street, Vancouver, British Columbia, V6C 2W2 or fax to 604.669.5095, quoting Project 6920.

Students meet Israelis, Arabs and Australians on trip

By ELI RUBENSTEIN
Special to The CJN

JERUSALEM — "It was like a dream," Stephanie Ross observed. The Toronto high school student was among 250 Canadian participants in the 2001 March of the Living who were taking part in Israel's 53rd anniversary celebrations on Yom Ha'atzmaut. They had spent the week before in Poland and were now in Israel for a week of intense travel, exploration and learning.

"Yom Ha'atzmaut? It was magical," she said. "You had a sense of something that you will find nowhere else in the world but Israel… The flags, the fireworks, the dancing…"

"It was wonderful to see Jews from around the world come together in Israel on Yom Ha'atzmaut," added Torontonain Sam Schnurbach.

However, the trip to Israel was not without its more sombre moments. The Canadian group also attended Yom Hazikaron ceremonies the day earlier in various locations in the country.

The Montreal contingent attended a moving Yom Hazikaron ceremony at a Beersheva high school, where each of the names of those who had attended the school and died in defence of the State was read out to a crowd of relatives and friends.

Following the event, students from Israel and Canada met to discuss their feelings about Israel and the Jewish people.

"As hard as Poland was, in some ways Israel is even harder. The conflict in Poland ended over 50 years ago, but the hard times in Israel still go on today and that really hurts," one Montreal student noted.

"I feel for the parents who had to light a memorial candle for their sons in tonight's ceremony, and for others who lit candles for their brothers. I can't imagine losing my own brother," she continued. "I am so sorry for all this."

"We feel a certain amount of guilt because we don't live in Israel and we don't serve in the army," another Montreal student added.

The Beersheva students were gracious in their response.

"The main thing is that we came together tonight," one Beersheva student responded. "I didn't choose to live in Israel – that is where I was born. And that is why I serve in the army. We are not heroes. If you fulfill your responsibilities, and we fulfill ours, and if we keep on watching out for each other, everything will be alright."

Another Beersheva student agreed with his peer. "When we live in Israel and serve in the army, we are fulfilling the Zionist part of our Jewish identity," he said. "But when you go on your own Jewish path, yet you still support Israel, and you visit Israel, you are also doing an important thing. I hope you know that you can choose how to express your Judaism and your Zionism," he added.

"Being in Israel on Yom Hazikaron and hearing the sirens go off instilled an instant feeling of sadness in me. I never knew the people who died, but I realized all those people were somebody's son or daughter, sister or brother. It made me appreciate how lucky I am to be healthy and alive," commented Janice Bader.

"The most amazing experience of being in Israel on Yom Hazikaron is the siren that sounds for a solitary minute," added Rachel Bernstein. "One nation puts aside all conflict for once – Orthodox and secular stand together as one unit, one people, one entity."

"As we commemorated Yom Hazikaron last night, and heard the siren today, I felt amazed to be in a land where people have such love for their country – a country they would die for," Sarah Regos of Australia said. "I love Israel."

The young student from Australia was among a group of approximately 30 Australian students who joined the Toronto 2001 March of the Living delegation.

"This was our first March of the Living program in Australia, so we wanted to join an experienced group," Sue Hampel, one of the leaders of the Australian delegation, said. "We were able to benefit from their knowledge and expertise, so much so that we can now run our own program in the future. We are also thrilled by the friendships that developed between the children."

"They were so friendly. We found that we had so many things in common. It was instant friendship!" an enthused Rachel Koffman of Toronto noted.

"It was an awesome experience. The Canadians welcomed us and made us feel that we were a part of their group," agreed Kim Shakenovsky of Sydney.

"Great friendships have been born!" exclaimed Jackie Cohen of Melbourne.

"We had an 'open-mike' policy on our bus," Avi Ben-Hur, one of the Israeli guides on the trip, said. "On day one, the first Canadian student to speak took the mike and talked about 'how nice it was to be joined by our Ozzie brothers and sisters, how great it was to be with other young Jews from around the world.' From that point on, the kids got along extremely well, and learned how similar they were to each other."

Knicks guard in foul trouble over comments

By PETER EPHROSS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — A New York Knicks basketball player has given himself more to worry about than his team's opponent in the NBA playoffs – despite his apology.

The American Jewish Congress is calling on Florida's secretary of state, Katherine Harris, to bench point guard Charlie Ward as the official spokesman for a state reading program after Ward was quoted in the April 22 edition of the New York Times Magazine, saying Jews were responsible for the death of Jesus.

In an article on the Knicks, Ward also was quoted as saying that Jews are persecuting Christians "every day."

Ward's "comments are hurtful and he needs to be responsible for them. The state needs to be responsible by not associating with him," said Jack Karako, executive director of the American Jewish Congress' Southeast region.

If Ward is allowed to continue in his role for the Born to Read program, it would be "as if the state is endorsing his comments," Karako added.

Harris, who made headlines during last fall's Florida vote recount battle between Al Gore and George W. Bush, has yet to respond to the call.

After he was publicly reprimanded by NBA Commissioner David Stern, Ward apologized in a statement released by the Knicks.

"I want to truly apologize to everybody who was offended by the New York Times Magazine story. I will say again that I would never condemn or criticize any group or religion," the statement said.

Ward also agreed to engage in a dialogue with Yechiel Eckstein, the founder and president of the International Fellowship of Christians and Jews, "in an effort to heal the wounds of the last few days."

Despite the apology, Karako said his group is still calling to have Ward replaced on the state reading program. He added that his group would wait to make its next move until after Ward and Eckstein meet.

After the initial comments were published, Ward told reporters that if they want to know the context for his statements, they should read the Bible. He added that his best friend – Jesus – is Jewish.

He further clarified his comments by saying that when he talked about Jews persecuting Christians, he was referring to Jews who denounce family members who convert to Christianity.

Ward's published comments revive the "historic myths that have been the source of anti-Semitism for centuries," the Anti-Defamation League said in a statement.

The Simon Wiesenthal Centre has invited the entire Knicks team to visit the group's Museum of Tolerance in Los Angeles. The centre is awaiting a response.

In the article, teammate Allan Houston was quoted as defending Ward's statement, while a third teammate suggested the Jewish writer join Jews for Jesus.

Despite the reprimand, Stern said he did not fine Ward – as was done in other incidents in which players, coaches and broadcasters made inappropriate remarks – because the commissioner "did not wish to enhance his sense of martyrdom."

Stern added that Ward "will have to accept the reactions and judgments of fans and all fair-minded people who have been offended."

Knicks fans booed when Ward took the court for a recent playoff game against the Toronto Raptors. But by the end of the game they were cheering Ward, who helped the Knicks win.

Promoter a real heavyweight

By MICHAEL BELLING
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JOHANNESBURG — A Jewish boxing promoter who credits the local Lebanese community for his success was the force behind the heavyweight title fight that took place recently near Johannesburg.

Promoter Rodney Berman described the Sunday morning match between Lennox Lewis and Hasim Rahman as "a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity for South Africa."

The program also included the International Boxing Federation's junior welterweight title bout between local champion Lehlohonolo "Hands of Stone" Ledwaba and the Mexican challenger, Carlos Contreras. Ledwaba retained his title.

Former president Nelson Mandela phoned after the fight to say, "Thank you for what you have done for South Africa," Berman said.

South Africa is still earning its way back into the international sports arena after being a sports pariah during the apartheid era.

A member of Johannesburg's Sandton Synagogue, Berman also said he had drawn much support for the event from the Jewish community – "probably because I am Jewish."

Rahman has indicated that he wishes to defend his title in South Africa, so Berman could have another major promotion here soon.

Berman has previously promoted several major matches, including world title fights between Brian Mitchell and Tony Lopez in the United States and "Prince" Naseem Hamed and Vuyani Bungu in the United Kingdom.

But none was on the scale of the heavyweight title match here in South Africa.

Berman started in the fight game 25 years ago.

"I owe my whole career to the Lebanese community," he said.

At that time, he was a lawyer – "a very struggling attorney," as he put it.

A business friend instructed him to sue Maurice Toweel, a member of the legendary South African boxing family of Lebanese origin – brother Victor became South Africa's first world champion in 1952, brother Willie fought to a draw with world bantamweight champion Robert Cohen of France, and other family members also fought in the ring.

"Maurice and I hit it off immediately," Berman said.

Rather than becoming enemies because of the legal action, "Maurice became my adopted stepfather," Berman said.

At that time, South African boxer Charlie Weir was in Toweel's stable, and Berman promoted several of his fights. He has been a boxing promoter ever since.

2 tblsp. honey

Broil or grill chicken until nicely browned. While chicken is cooking, mix together orange juice, honey and ginger. When chicken is almost cooked, remove from grill and place in large skillet. Add orange juice mixture and cook until liquid reduces and chicken completes cooking, about 10 mins. Add mango slices just before removing from heat, so they warm, but not cook. Serve over rice or couscous. Serves 4.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

I auditioned for a show at my school whose subject matter is very personal and important to me. I didn't get in, and I'm really upset by it. The same kids get in year after year, and every time I talk to the teachers about it, they say, "Well, we only want the best." I am completely fed up. What should I do?

— Troubled

Dear Troubled,

I'm not going to tell you to keep trying and not to give up, because you've obviously done that already and nothing has changed. I think what you need to do is take this to the administration level. The problem with high schools is that they leave everything to be done by the students. They seem to have completely lost sight of the fact that school performances are meant to be a learning experience for everyone and not just the social and academic elite.

The first thing you should do is call the school and request to speak with the principal, vice-principal, or counsellor (choose someone with whom you have spoken before and found helpful). You'll probably have to leave a message and they will call you back.

Tell the administrator that you would like to discuss the audition process of the school play. Then tell them exactly what you said here – how the subject concerning the play is very important to you and how you've noticed that the same students get in year after year. If they say, "Well, we only want the best," just like your other teachers, tell them that you were under the impression that high school was a learning process and that that learning process should be open to everyone. Creating a "school celebrity" archetype will in turn create a "social royalty ladder." I don't think that any school needs or wants this.

If your speaking to an administrator doesn't work, don't be embarrassed to get your parents involved. Have them, or one of them, go in and speak to the administrator themselves. Let them know that this is a very serious issue for you and that it is something that needs to be addressed immediately. Don't be disappointed, though, if changes don't start happening before the next school play.

I hope you have found these suggestions helpful, and above all, remember that the kids getting into the play are in no way better than you. Good luck!

Dear Karilani is written on a rotating basis by three high school students. The drawing is a composite. We welcome questions from our readers. Please mail, e-mail or fax them to The CJN.

Rabbis 'blitz' Ottawa

A group of rabbis from communities in Quebec and Ontario last week spent an entire day meeting with parliamentarians and government officials in Ottawa. The 15 rabbis blitzed the Hill and carried a message of support for Israel to more than 60 MPs, senators and officials from the Department of Foreign Affairs. In their discussions, the rabbis affirmed the bonds that tie Canadian Jewry to Israel, the concern within the community about the current violence in the Middle East, and the expectation that Canada will stand firmly with Israel, especially at the UN and other international forums. The initiative was conceived by Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz of Montreal and the Canada-Israel Committee, Quebec region, and quickly spread to include rabbis from Ottawa, Kingston and Toronto. Rabbi Steinmetz and MP Carolyn Bennett, who hosted a luncheon in the rabbis' honour, both pledged to treat this visit as the first in a series of ongoing consultations. Full coverage of the day's meetings will appear in next week's issue.

Cabinet to hear from Oberlander

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A former Nazi killing squad member will attempt to stave off deportation by presenting to the federal cabinet the reasons he should retain Canadian citizenship.

Helmut Oberlander, a retired builder who lives in Kitchener, Ont., has agreed to respond to the recommendations advanced by Citizenship and Immigration Minister Elinor Caplan, who is expected to urge her cabinet colleagues to strip Oberlander of his citizenship as a prelude to his removal from Canada.

Eric Hafemann, lawyer for Oberlander, said that in addition to responding to Caplan's submissions, he would pursue other legal measures as well.

"In the event they should rule against us, we're off to judicial review, which procedure I've already instituted, perhaps prematurely, but there is already an application pending," Hafemann said.

Fourteen months ago a Federal Court judge ruled that although there was no evidence that Oberlander personally participated in atrocities, he had obtained Canadian citizenship by misrepresenting his wartime role with Einsatzkommando 10A, a notorious killing squad responsible for murdering tens of thousands of Jews.

The court's finding opened the door to Caplan to recommend to the cabinet that Oberlander be stripped of his citizenship.

"Caplan made the morally correct decision, in my view," said Moshe Ronen, outgoing president of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Jewish groups had urged that Caplan proceed expeditiously – as they had for the entire war crimes portfolio – but last week, the German-Canadian Congress slammed Caplan for seeking "revenge" against Oberlander, and it suggested that Jewish groups had special access to Ottawa politicians.

The Globe and Mail quoted Paul Tuerr, vice-president of the Ontario chapter of the German-Canadian Congress, as saying: "She [Caplan] is not looking for justice, she is looking for revenge."

The News in Brief

CANADA

New BB President

TORONTO — Rochelle Wilner took over as national president of B'nai Brith Canada last week. Wilner has served as a senior vice-president of the fraternal group and as a volunteer in its League for Human Rights and affordable housing program. She becomes the second female president in B'nai Brith Canada's 126-year history.

ISRAEL

Arafat, PA Sued

JERUSALEM — A 20-million shekel lawsuit was filed here last week against Palestinian President Yasser Arafat, the PLO, its Fatah wing and four residents of the PA. The plaintiffs in the suit are the parents of two Tel Aviv cousins, Etgar Zeituni, 23, and Motti Dayan, 35, who were murdered by Palestinians when they accompanied an Israeli-Arab friend to Tul Karm to purchase decorations for the restaurant they had opened together.

Appeal on Wagner

JERUSALEM — Israeli legislators last week appealed to organizers of the Israel Festival to cancel performances of works by the anti-Semitic composer Richard Wagner at the upcoming festival here. The motion passed 17-0 in a special Knesset session. The initiator of the motion, National Religious Party MK Shaul Yahalom, said the Israel Festival is an official, state affair that should not offend Holocaust survivors.

Rabbi Carlebach Dies

LONDON — Rabbi Julius Carlebach, who escaped Germany as a child and rose to become a leading scholar, died in England last month at the age of 79. Rabbi Carlebach came to England at the age of 16, while the rest of his family, including his father Rabbi Joseph Carlebach, perished in the Holocaust. After serving in Britain's Royal Navy during the war, he was spiritual leader of the Nairobi Hebrew Congregation. He went on to study at the University of Sussex, where he taught German-Jewish studies for the rest of his life.

Zuckerman Tapped

NEW YORK — As expected, Mortimer Zuckerman has been recommended to serve as the next chair of the influential Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations. Zuckerman was selected last month over two other finalists. A confirmation vote has yet to be scheduled. Zuckerman is real estate magnate and publisher of U.S. News & World Report and the New York Daily News.

Gays' Challenge

NEW YORK — Gay medical students plan to challenge Yeshiva University's policy of barring gay couples from its married student housing at a hearing before New York state's highest court next week. The university, which has argued that its policy of requiring a marriage certificate is not discriminatory, won in two lower courts in 1999 and 2000.

Not Guilty Plea

NEW YORK — A rabbi accused of molesting and sexually harassing scores of teenagers in the Orthodox Union's youth group has pleaded not guilty to separate criminal charges that he fondled two teenage students while principal of a New Jersey yeshiva. Rabbi Baruch Lanner, who resigned from the OU last summer, faces up to 40 years in prison and $250,000 in fines if convicted on the charges.

Parents Sue JCC

LOS ANGELES — The parents of a boy wounded by a white supremacist during a shooting rampage at a Jewish community centre in 1999 are suing the centre, charging it did not provide adequate security to prevent hate crimes. Charles and Eleanor Kadish filed the lawsuit last week on behalf of their son Benjamin, who sustained the most critical injuries among the five people shot by Buford Furrow Jr. Benjamin, who was five when the shooting occurred in August 1999, continues to bear both physical and emotional scars from the trauma, the lawsuit claims.

Canada, Israel Co-operate on Drug Busts

Canadian and Israeli police have co-operated in the arrest of at least 10 Israelis suspected of involvement in a four-nation drug smuggling ring.

The year-long investigation uncovered an operation that sent hundreds of thousands of Ecstasy pills from the Netherlands to Israel, Canada and the United States. Among those arrested are haredim from Jerusalem and Canada, and members of an Israeli group that allegedly ran a laboratory in Amsterdam that manufactured the popular drug.

Last December, Toronto RCMP officers seized 150,000 Ecstasy pills at Pearson Airport. Acting on a tip from Israeli police in March, the RCMP seized 32,000 tablets hidden inside a table at Montreal's Dorval airport.

Israeli police said both batches were part of a shipment of 500,000 Ecstasy pills that were manufactured in Holland. Many of them were smuggled into Israel.

According to Ha'aretz, the Montreal operation led to the arrest of a haredi man who was supposed to receive the shipment.

The arrests in Israel included five Jerusalem men, one of them a haredi from Mea Shearim who is suspected of organizing the couriers for the drugs.

Baycrest, Federation launch new partnership

$1 million grant awarded

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — UJA FEDERATION has given a $1-million grant to the Apotex Centre, the Jewish Home for the Aged and the Louis and Leah Posluns Centre for Stroke and Cognition at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

The money, according to a joint press release from UJA FEDERATION and Baycrest Centre, is "a key component of a new partnership between the two organizations to address the needs of Toronto's Jewish elderly." It supports Baycrest's new Campaign for Care.

The grant will help offset the $4-million deficit created by cuts to the long-term care system by the provincial government.

Alan Sandler, president of UJA FEDERATION, said there has always been a close relationship between Baycrest and the federation, even though until now Baycrest has operated independently financially.

"We have many common board members, and had many joint meetings together with the government about long-term care issues," Sandler said.

At a recent meeting between federation and executive directors of major Jewish agencies, Sandler said, Baycrest representatives reported that they were going to raise funds to offset the shortfall.

"We came to an agreement," Sandler said. "We told them we didn't think that [an independent fund-raising effort] would be the best way to go."

Federation will earmark $1 million in the next budget for the Jewish Home for the Aged, Sandler said.

Even more important, he said, is that the federation will become involved in Baycrest's plan to establish a site north of Steeles. The problem of how to deal with both the capital cost of a new facility and the ongoing expenses for its maintenance will be the focus of a joint committee of UJA FEDERATION and Baycrest.

This committee, however, will not deal only with short-term considerations. It will also address the issue of long-term care in the Jewish community, which, because of the increasing number of seniors, is going to be a major community concern.

"It is as if there is a train barrelling down the road with no driver and no tracks," Sandler said.

The plan, he said, is to sit down with Baycrest, Bernard Betel, Circle of Care and any other organization providing care for the elderly, and discuss "ways to make life richer for them," not only through physical structures, but through such aspects of life as kashrut, Shabbat observance and chanukiot, and by dealing with more troubling matters such as palliative and hospice care.

At the same time, he said, it is necessary to recognize that "the province doesn't care [about the situation], and the Ministry of Health doesn't have the wherewithal to do anything about it."

One plan is to work with other ethnic communities, especially ones that also have non-English-speaking members. "We want to see what type of route we should take, especially with the lowest possible funding."

Baycrest, Sandler said, is "our premier facility for the aged. We must decide how best to use it and the other agencies," to best serve the aging Jewish population.

Stephen W. Herbert, president and CEO of Baycrest, was not available for comment. However, in a media release, he said that "while we are implementing measures to reduce our operating costs, we are approaching donors of $1,000 or more to help us make up a budget shortfall of $4.5 million, which, thanks to UJA FEDERATION's generous gift, has now been reduced."

The federation's participation is part of its Jewish Toronto Tomorrow initiative, which aims to "create partnerships matching philanthropists with projects that meet community needs," the press release said.

From the editor's desk

Last July, after Camp David placed him squarely at the historic crossroad of choice, Yasser Arafat chose not to make peace with Israel. In total, abject repudiation of the written commitments he had given to the president of the United States and to two governments of Israel, he unleashed the forces of destruction and violence and launched a "low-level" war against the Jewish State.

Arafat's campaign continues unabated, sophisticated in its cynical, calculated deployment of the instruments of terror and of public relations.

He has known from the outset, indeed, has relied upon the fact that Israel's defensive countermeasures to PA-directed violence would occasion physical and economic suffering for the Palestinian people.

And he has also known, indeed has relied equally on the fact that newspapers and networks throughout the world would bring the graphic details and images of that suffering into the homes of countless readers and viewers.

After eight months, Arafat's campaign is yielding predictable results.

His people are indeed suffering. Hundreds have died; hundreds more have been wounded; the economy is in shambles; the prevailing mood alternates between despair and gloom; and hatred of all authority, including ironically his own, has taken root.

And Israel, once again, finds itself cast as the villain in many capitals of the world, especially in Europe, having to justify why it responds with force against the people who attempt to murder its citizens and strike at its very existence.

In the April 23 edition of The Jerusalem Report, the widely-respected commentator on Arab affairs, Ehud Ya'ari, reported that Arafat had formulated a number of new tactical goals after his return from the Arab summit in Amman last month.

One of those goals has direct implications for supporters of the Jewish state outside Israel.

"There is a desire to provide a 'popular cover' for terror acts in the form of violent demonstrations of youths opposite [IDF] army positions," Ya'ari's column reads. "Arafat seeks to present the upswing in terror as a response to an Israeli 'offensive.' The PA is expected to attempt to gain a degree of international legitimization for its 'armed resistance of occupation.'"

> 'We, who care for Israel, must be on guard here.'

We, who care for Israel, must be on guard here, ready to respond to and oppose the inevitable efforts by local Canadian commentators who attempt to "legitimize" the Palestinian violence.

Increasingly, we read or hear the phrase, "Israeli occupation" used as the explanation for that violence. But the phrase should be challenged.

It is true that Israel has imposed blockades along certain roads in the territories and that Palestinians, in certain areas, cannot move freely wherever they wish. But the blockades have been a reaction to, not the cause of, the violence.

Some 90 percent of Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza already live under PA rule. They are not subject to the authority of Israel, except when in Israel proper. By no reasonable use of the term can it be said that Israel "occupies" them.

More to the point, however, Israel tried vigorously and earnestly, under the government of Ehud Barak, to relinquish, for all time, all "occupying" control over the lives of any Palestinian. But Barak's efforts were rebuffed by the PA's president, the very man who now leads the chorus of condemnation against Israel for being an "occupier" when he refused to sign an agreement that would have established a Palestinian state on virtually all of the territory of the West Bank and Gaza.

For large numbers in the Arab and Muslim world, the phrase "Israeli occupation" is code. It does not mean there what it means in the West. In the Arab world, it generally means the "occupation" of the entirety of the land on which a Jewish State was established in 1948.

Such a meaning of the phrase must also always be challenged.

In the same article, Ya'ari also writes, the "semi-rapprochement between Arafat and Syrian President Bashar al-Assad may also have military implications. Diplomatic co-ordination [between Syria and the PA] can act as a bridge to a kind of limited partnership between Arafat and Hassan Nasrallah; between the PA and Hezbollah. Hezbollah's TV channel Al-Manar is already focusing on the Palestinian issue. There are the beginnings of a Hezbollah terror network in the territories and their ambition has no bounds."

This "semi-rapprochement" with the PA lends extra urgency to the intemperate, ignorant remarks by the young president when he received the Pope in Damascus last weekend.

Bashar accused Israel of torturing and murdering Palestinians and suggested that Christians and Muslims make "common cause against those who try to kill the principles of all religions with the same mentality with which they betrayed Jesus Christ." Bashar also suggested to the Pope that the Jewish people had unjustly benefitted from exaggerating their past sufferings.

Ultimately, the campaign Arafat let loose in September will harm his own people far more than it will the Jewish people. Such campaigns always do. But the morally inverted language must not be allowed to stand as the false record of the latest round of violence directed against Israel and the Jewish world.

Toronto teen finishes second in International Bible Contest

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Eliav Danziger (on screen) in International Bible Contest.

TORONTO — It was the "Prime Minister's Question" that bumped Eliav Danziger up into second place in the finals of the International Bible Contest in Jerusalem.

Danziger, 17, recently won second prize in the Chidon Tanach. He was also named Diaspora youth champion.

"I spent the last eight months studying on my own for two or three hours a day," Danziger said.

"In Israel, we were told that the Israeli contestants spend eight to 10 hours a day preparing for the contest. They don't go to any other classes."

After graduating from Or Chaim Yeshiva this year, Danziger is planning to make aliyah to Israel.

"I'm planning to go to Yeshivat Hesder Yerucham in the Negev for 3½ years and then serve in the army for a year and a half."

The contest's first-prize award was a scholarship for a degree at Bar-Ilan University. At this point, Danziger isn't sure what he wants to study.

Danziger has two brothers, Uri and Itamar who already live in Israel, and a sister, Yiska, studying at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

"I would like to thank my parents, Leif and Ruhama, and Or Chaim for supporting me," Danziger said.

By the way, the clincher that tripped his opponent was a "who said it" question, which was chosen by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

"It was tricky because the same quote is said in two different places, but the words are ordered differently."

On this occasion, it was Yehizkiyahu in Chronicles II (Chapter 31, verse 7), who said to the captains of the people of Israel: "Be strong and courageous, be not afraid or dismayed."

Insured Annuities - Lifetime Guarantees of 9% Plus

In today's environment of low interest rates and volatile stock markets, many investors seek more attractive and less stressful investments.

If you are at retirement age and trying to maximize spendable income from non-RRSP savings, insured annuities provide the best of both worlds - significantly higher after-tax income for life and the capital guaranteed tax-free to your estate. The older you are, the higher the yield on your investment.

Consider the following example, which compares the investment of $200,000 in a GIC at 5% with an insured annuity, for a man aged 75.

GIC versus Insured Annuity

	GIC	Insured Annuity
Capital	200,000	200,000
Annual Income	10,000	23,500
Taxable Income	10,000	4,500
Tax (50%)	5,000	2,250
After Tax Income	5,000	21,250
Insurance Cost	NIL	11,250
Spendable Income	5,000	10,000
Gross Equivalent Yield	5%	10%
Estate Value	200,000	200,000
Subject to Probate	YES	NO
Guaranteed Period	5 YEARS	LIFE

Effective improved yield on investment = 100%

CJC Plenary attended by close to 1,000 registrants

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Almost 1,000 registrants attended Canadian Jewish Congress' 26th Plenary Assembly, which began here on Sunday.

An annual general meeting opened the day-and-a-half-long plenary, in which Irving Abella, a professor at York University and a past national president and chair of the CJC war crimes committee, was named honorary president of CJC. Later that evening at the gala dinner, he received the Samuel Bronfman Medal for service to Canadian Jewish Congress and the Jewish community of Canada.

The dinner, hosted by Peter Mansbridge, chief correspondent for CBC Television News, was a tribute to the late actor Al Waxman, who was to have been chair of the plenary.

At the plenary's closing luncheon on Monday, attended by Ontario Premier Mike Harris, Edgar Bronfman, president of World Jewish Congress (WJC), was presented with the Saul Hayes Human Rights Award for his outstanding leadership of WJC and the World Jewish Restitution Organization, and his efforts on behalf of Holocaust survivors and the rights of Jews around the world.

Awards were also given to David Shapiro and Stefani Balinski, both from Quebec, who received the Brian A. Finestone Memorial Award and the Monroe Abbey Award, respectively.

On Sunday, the first major plenum session featured a discussion on funding of private religious schools. (Please see sidebar.)

A session on Jewish Advocacy in Canada facilitated by Jim Carr, founding president and CEO of the Business Council of Manitoba, included Stanley Hartt, former chief of staff to Brian Mulroney; Allan Kaufman, former chief of staff to Art Eggleton; and Michele Landsberg, a columnist with the Toronto Star. Respondent was Art Hagopian, president of the Canadian Ethnocultural Council.

Landsberg said secular Jews who have not identified with the Jewish community are some of the most effective and passionate advocates.

"We must widen our embrace of the Jewish community so we won't lose these Jews."

Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut, senior scholar of Holy Blossom Temple and a past president of CJC, moderated a session on Holocaust Restitution.

"The Holocaust is at the forefront of our considerations and concerns, and adequate and just restitution is part of those concerns."

On the panel was Neal Sher, chief of staff of the International Commission on Holocaust-Era Insurance Claims, and Elan Steinberg, executive director of World Jewish Congress.

Concurrent to that session was a panel on child poverty, and a panel about issues facing Jewish students on campus. (Story on student issues will run in a subsequent CJN issue.)

The session on child poverty was moderated by Elaine Todres. Speakers were Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld of Temple Emanu-El in Toronto, who organized the Campaign against Child Poverty; social activist June Callwood; Teri Kay of Jewish Family and Child Services; and Claire Morris and Gordon Zeesman of Human Resources Development Canada.

Rabbi Bielfield said that more than 20 percent of Canada's children live in poverty and the "Jewish figures on poverty are virtually identical to the Canadian figures."

School breakfast programs or after-school programs take care of a few children five days a week, Callwood said, but "that is not the answer. The answer is to change public opinion so everyone says, 'Let's take care of our kids.'"

Zeesman said, however, that when children go hungry, it is not usually a food problem; it is that the family is paying too much rent. Affordable housing would help these families, he added.

A discussion on the Middle East and Jerusalem was facilitated by Steve Paikin, co-host of TVOntario's Studio 2. Panelists included MP for Mount Royal Irwin Cotler; Rabbi Michael Melchior, Israel's deputy foreign minister and former chief rabbi of Norway; and Rabbi Israel Singer, secretary general of World Jewish Congress.

The reason negotiations in the Middle East failed, said Rabbi Melchior, was that the Palestinians are not ready to make peace with Israel.

Cotler said that at the core of the conflict "has been the unwillingness of Arab states to accept the legitimacy of a Jewish state."

A panel on media issues was hosted by Mordechai Ben-Dat, editor, The Canadian Jewish News. Speakers included Michel Auger, a political columnist with Journal de Montréal; Marcus Gee of the Globe and Mail; Isabel Vincent of the National Post and author of Hitler's Silent Partners: Swiss Banks, Nazi Gold and the Pursuit of Justice; and Tom Rose, CEO and publisher of the Jerusalem Post.

At press time on Monday, a session was held on contemporary anti-Semitism, moderated by Irving Abella. Speakers, were lawyer Warren Kinsella, Rabbi Melchior, Elan Steinberg, and Daniel Pipes, director of the Middle East Forum and columnist for the Jerusalem Post.

Also on Monday was a talk by Opposition Leader Stockwell Day, and the debate of 16 resolutions on such topics as Nazi-looted art, poverty in Canada, hate crimes, hate on the Internet and the Lord's Prayer.

School funding debated

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The cost of a private Jewish education would increase if government funding was secured, educator Bernard Shapiro told the Canadian Jewish Congress plenary last Sunday.

Saying he fully supports public funds for private and independent schools largely as a moral issue, Shapiro, who was speaking as part of a panel, warned nevertheless that fees for Jewish day schools would go up if tax dollars for them were available.

Because they would draw many more children and put added pressure on the system, costs "would far exceed the funding provided," said Shapiro, who headed a provincial Royal Commission into private school funding in 1985.

Shapiro earned applause when he said Ontario is "morally bound" to fund Jewish schools the same way it funds Catholic education.

Panelist Michael Bryant, the Liberal MPP for St. Paul's, said the situation facing private schools in Ontario is the most "self-evident example of discrimination in Canada." The status quo cannot go on, he said. Otherwise, "the tyranny of the majority will prevail."

Tory MPP Tina Molinari said she too is a booster of funding for Jewish day schools, and noted it was her government that has allocated a total of $14.4 million toward health services in private schools, money that should be flowing soon, and made retroactive to last year.Molinari, the MPP for Thornhill, said she met recently with Finance Minister Jim Flaherty and Attorney General David Young to discuss a provincial tax credit against private school fees. The idea, she said, was well-received.

Ed Morgan, the newly installed chair of CJC's Ontario region and the lawyer who argued the funding case before the Supreme Court of Canada, called on the community to redouble its efforts, and also called on the province to consider it a priority.

Justice, not Politics, is the true dossier

It was with great sadness and regret that we read comments last week attributed to an official of the German-Canadian Congress, attacking the integrity of the justice system in Canada, the federal minister of immigration, Elinor Caplan, and the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

In a report published last Friday in the Globe and Mail, Paul Tuerr, vice-president of the Ontario chapter of German-Canadian Congress, condemned the decision by the minister of citizenship and immigration to recommend to cabinet the initiation, finally, of procedures against Helmut Oberlander to strip him of his Canadian citizenship and remove him from the country.

But Tuerr's condemnation did not relate to the substance of the case against Oberlander. Rather, he impugned the motives of the minister, attacking her personally. "She is not looking for justice; she is looking for revenge," Tuerr said, according to the Globe.

He also impugned the entire adjudicative and administrative process in immigration matters by accusing the government of conferring some sort of special "access" to the CJC that it denies other community organizations. "Where are we as the German Congress? Where is the Ukrainian Congress, the Greek Congress? Nobody has access except the Jewish Congress," Tuerr stated.

The accusations were quickly and harshly criticized as "ill-considered" and "unfortunate" by the Department of Immigration and denied, as false, by the CJC. It was also correctly pointed out by outgoing CJC president Moshe Ronen that "claims that certain groups have special access to the government are destructive to the multicultural harmony of the country."

More than a year ago, after long and careful proceedings in accordance with Canadian law, the Federal Court ruled that Helmut Oberlander had lied about his Nazi past when he originally applied for entry into Canada some years ago. Oberlander had been a member of the Einsatzgruppen, the notorious killing unit of the Nazis that stalked the Eastern European countryside during World War II, murdering Jews and others detested by Hitler's regime. The United States has not allowed and will not allow Oberlander entry there. It is now past time for the government of Canada to remove him from our borders.

Tuerr's diatribe was as offensive as it was regrettable because he attempted to remove the issue from the dossier of Justice and place it, instead, into the dossier of expedience and Politics.

Alas, his allegations will also fit quite neatly into the world view of those people who cling, still, to malevolent, medieval fantasies and conspiracy theories about Jews.

Value systems are different

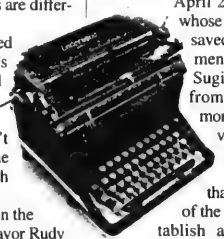
Perhaps your contrasting cover photos (CJN, April 12) overstated it a bit, but the point is clear: the value systems of the two societies are different – plain and simple. True, Palestinians have emotions and many feel the terrible pain of the current war. Yet they call dead ones shaheeds (martyrs) and their cries are for more dead Jews, not despair at the death of their own.

Why are Palestinian children not in school; why are they advancing towards IDF posts? Because death is not feared or treated in the same way in their society. Ironically, your readers make your point nicely for you. Is Al-Quds (the official PA newspaper) filled with letters to the editor? What about the Cairo daily where overt vicious anti-Semitic attacks are published day after day? No. Their pages are silent because the values are different.



The sadness is that Jews are so disillusioned that they want to pin the intifadah on Arafat's "failures" or on a lack of understanding and empathy by Barak. As Daniel Pipes noted recently, one can search for excuses and explanations, but the sad reality is that we don't share the same desire to live together. The majority in the PA still see the conflict with Israel as a zero-sum game.

War is tragic. Israel does make mistakes in the exercise of state power, but as New York's mayor Rudy Giuliani has pointed out, "Israel is a nation of laws." The PA is not.

Says column a copout

In "From the editor's desk" (CJN, April 29), you say that you normally do not respond to letters to the editor. You should have stuck with your policy. Your editorial is a copout! The more you say and write, the more ridiculous it sounds. You sound like an anti-Semite making excuses by suggesting that although they hate Israel, they are not Jew haters. The two pictures were used for a purpose on the front page of The CJN: to insult and degrade the Palestinian people. You accomplished this. Your editorial succeeds in putting your foot in your mouth.

Holding Germans to account

Regarding the article "Historic debate underway in Germany" (CJN, April 19), it always amazes me that when the Germans want to get off the hook for their notorious behaviour before and during the Holocaust, they always bring in the stereotypical concept of Jews and money: "...demand for compensation...is now all about money and not morality."

The Germans took the Jews' businesses, emptied their bank accounts, stole their valuables and their freedom and shipped them by rail to camps where they worked them to death for free labour and then murdered them. But they didn't stop there. They yanked the gold out of the corpses' mouths.

And now these Germans (Nazis if you like, but they were still Germans) have the temerity and audacity to talk about money. The corruption of their thinking overwhelms me to this day. Will they ever be able to extract the Jew-hating and killing genes from their bodies?

CJC and Senpo Sugihara

Sheldon Kirshner's article on Senpo Sugihara (CJN, April 26) sheds important light on a man whose selfless act of courage and humanity saved the lives of more than 6,000 Jewish men, women and children. It is said that Sugihara continued to issue transit visas from his train window up to the very moment of his departure from Kovno, the very image of a man who has found his moment in time!

Readers may be interested to know that Canadian Jewish Congress was one of the first organizations in the world to establish an award in memory of Consul Sugihara's courageous work. In 1993, a tribute dinner was held in his memory under the joint sponsorship of CJC and the National Association of Japanese Canadians. Since then, the Senpo Sugihara Humanitarian Award has been given on three occasions to students between the ages of 13 and 18 who have distinguished themselves through acts of humanitarianism or through significant work in the area of race and ethnic relations.

We hope that Robert Kirk's dpocumentary, Sugihara: Conspiracy of Kindness, will serve to bring additional attention and honour to the memory of this heroic man.

Omsk has a shul too

The article, "Toronto Yeshiva Bocher Helps Run Siberia Seder," (CJN, May 3) noted that Irkutsk "is home to the only synagogue in Siberia." In the interests of accuracy, I'm writing to bring to your attention a congregation in Omsk, Siberia, which has been in operation for at least the past five years in a restored synagogue building. The congregation is called Or Chadash.

There may be others as well. This correction in no way diminishes the human interest aspects of the story you printed.

Perspectives

Abba Eban: an appreciation

By GIDEON SAGUY

Abba Eban, the former foreign minister of Israel, recently received the coveted Israel Prize, the State's highest honour, given annually on Yom Ha'atzmaut to a select number of distinguished Israeli personalities in public life, academics, literature and the arts.

Eban, a graduate of Cambridge University, became involved in the creation of the State as secretary to the scientist and Zionist leader Chaim Weizmann, who eventually became the State's first president.

Eban made the case for a Jewish State in the contentious debates around the Partition Plan, finally passed by the United Nations on Nov. 29, 1947, and culminating with the admission of Israel to the UN on May 11, 1949.

He was Israel's first representative to the UN, later serving concurrently as its ambassador to the United States. He made his mark with an agile intellectual mind and a felicitous turn of phrase.

At the UN, Eban took Israel's place, in alphabetical order, between Ireland and Italy. This prompted the American representative to ask Eban jokingly if he and his Irish and Italian colleagues were deciding the mayoral election in New York City.

Eban had his hands full at the UN. At the Security Council, he delivered a speech on Nov. 1, 1956, after the Egyptian dictator, Colonel Gamal Nasser, decided to provoke Israel by closing the Suez Canal to Israeli shipping.

"Stretching back far behind the events of this week lies the unique and sombre story of a small people subjected throughout all the years of its national existence to a furious, implacable, comprehensive campaign of hatred and siege for which there is no parallel or precedent in the modern history of nations," he said.

Eban went on to make a case for Israel's position from the days of the Armistice agreements subsequent to the War of Independence in 1948, when Israel was attacked by surrounding Arab states, to the blockades of the Suez Canal and other maritime approaches.

Ending the speech on his usual positive note, he said, "Beyond the moment when fire will cease, the prospect must not be one of unilateral claims by one party against the other. The horizon must be of peace by agreement." His words were praised by then-prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, and many other statesmen.

In 1959, Eban entered the hurly-burly of Israel's politics, joining the Labour party, and getting elected to the Knesset. He held a number of cabinet positions until appointed foreign minister in 1966, a position he held until 1974.

Soon after he was appointed, war clouds gathered again over the Middle East. Nasser had once more imposed a blockade, and the world – in particular, the Jewish world – feared for Israel's existence, with the threat of an onslaught by the Egyptian and Syrian armies.

At the end of May 1967, Eban rushed to the United States to meet with president Lyndon Johnson, who told him, "You are the victims of aggression. I have made that clear to the American people."

The president then handed Eban a note, which said, "Israel will not be alone unless it decides to go it alone."

In the following days, the situation deteriorated further. When the maritime nations did not come to an agreement about the opening of the Suez Canal, the Six Day War ensued.

Eban appeared before the General Assembly of the UN and said, "On the morning of June 5, our country's choice was plain: the choice was to live or perish; to defend the national existence or to forfeit it for all time.

"The exploit of Israel's armies will be told from one generation to another with the deepest pride. The Soviet Union has described our resistance as aggression and sought to have it condemned. We reject this accusation with all our might. Here was armed force employed in a just and righteous cause, as righteous as the defence of freedom at Valley Forge, as just as the expulsion of Hitler's bombers from British skies, as noble as the protection of Stalingrad against the Nazi hordes."

The speech was a masterpiece in statesmanship and rhetoric. Even though it was the middle of the night in Israel, prime minister Levi Eshkol phoned Eban to congratulate him. The following morning, the American press also lauded the speech. The world at large uttered a sigh of relief, the prowess of the Israel army and air force was high, the Sinai Peninsula was again in Israeli hands and Jerusalem was united.

At the same time, Eban pursued his literary bent, writing the books My Country, My People, An Autobiography, and The New Diplomacy: International Affairs in the Modern Age. With his sometimes caustic style, he gives the reader insights into the conduct of diplomacy. In an early example, he describes his meeting in London in 1947 with Azzam Pasha, then secretary of the Arab league, who made clear the Arabs' resistance to Partition.

"We shall have to try to destroy you," he said. "Won't you have another cup of tea?"

About New Diplomacy, Henry Kissinger commented: "Abba Eban approaches international problems with statesmanship, eloquence, balanced judgment and an insight born of distinguished experience. These qualities which have won him renown in the world diplomatic community, are brilliantly reflected in this book."

Eban and Kissinger knew each other well, particularly from the days of Kissinger's shuttle diplomacy after the Six Day War. On one of Kissinger's trips, they passed the Monastery at Latrun, on the way to Jerusalem.

When Kissinger asked Eban what order the monks belong to, Eban explained that the Trappists are an ascetic order of silent monks with only the abbot allowed to speak to the outside world. To this Kissinger responded, "Oh, just like the State Department," and Eban quipped back, "Wish it were so in our foreign office."

This book, like many of his others, was widely translated and received positive reviews. In reference to the last chapter, John Gellner, then the editor of the Canadian Defence Quarterly, said, "It should be read with particular attention. Rather surprisingly, albeit convincingly, it takes on a note of optimism."

Indeed, Eban concluded with these words: "Diplomacy must be judged by what it prevents, not only by what it achieves. Much of it is a holding action designed to avoid explosion until the unifying forces of history take humanity into their embrace."

Later in his life, he wrote his most interesting book, Personal Witness – Israel Through My Eyes. Of the many important diplomatic episodes he experienced, he wrote extensively about the Yom Kippur War, the most difficult war that Israel had fought. He summed it up in this way: "The Israeli army and air force had been restored beyond their previous strength by the American airlift, yet hardly anyone in Israel spoke of 'victory.' Israel had won the war but there was no mood of celebration. Egypt had lost the war but had not been humiliated. A new psychological balance had been established. It seemed to augur well for negotiations."

These were not words chosen in hindsight. Eban had said at the time, in a private conversation, that the Egyptian army had removed a psychological barrier when they managed to cross the Suez Canal. Indeed, this act eventually led to President Anwar Sadat's visit to Jerusalem, his speech at the Knesset and the signing of a peace treaty between Israel and Egypt.

Another incident Eban described in his book was a meeting he had with former U.S.S.R. president Mikhail Gorbachev.

"What would I have thought of anyone who would have predicted in early 1990 that within a year I would be attending a dinner in New York organized by a Jewish organization in honour of 'ex-President Mikhail Gorbachev?' Yet here I was shaking his firm hand and furtively contemplating the birthmark on the much photographed bald pate.

"He had spoken lucidly, but without eloquence, against anti-Semitism and had taken due credit for restoring relations with Israel, without giving the impression that he saw this as his most cherished achievement. A flood of rhetoric from his Jewish hosts had exalted him as the victor in an epoch-making struggle against despotism. The tributes, as is usual on such occasions, were repetitive and not excessively brief. Yet they were substantially true. His life had mattered to the world."

Eban finished his book with a tribute, reminding his readers of the State's legacy: "In the end I can only salute the hero of my story – the Jewish people, battered by the tempest of a tragic history but still endowed with an incomparable recuperative power... Most nations exhort their new generations to fix their eyes resolutely on the future. Young Israelis would do well to spare a thought and memory for the poignant early days when our founding fathers put our flag into the winds of history."

Though Eban is no longer active in day-to-day diplomatic activities, his voice retains its power, and he still has the ability to coin a phrase. In a recent interview about the talks with the Palestinians, he said, "They never miss an opportunity to miss an opportunity" to come to terms with reality.

There are people who suggest that Eban lives in an intellectual ivory tower. This is certainly removed from the truth. On the rare occasions when he was not preoccupied with affairs of state or of the Jewish people, he could let his hair down, and, with his wife Suzy at his side, talk about films, the theatre, the latest books and good food.

Considering his many contributions and his years of work in the diplomatic arena, there is no doubt that Eban has earned the accolade, "The voice of Israel."

Ye Olde Book

During the Pesach week, a friend called me and asked whether I had seen a particular review that had appeared in the New York Times. The article he referred to dealt primarily with a book by Benson Bobrick: The Story of the English Bible and the Revolution it Inspired.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

My friend wanted to know the origin of certain quotes found in the Bible. He was interested in three of them:

The first quotation, "The fathers have eaten sour grapes and the children's teeth are set on edge," was from Jeremiah 31:29.

His next enquiry concerned the origin of the words "a broken reed." The translation of the Hebrew hakaneh haratsutz is nowadays rendered as "a splintered reed," and is found several times in prophetic writings (see for instance Isaiah 36:6).

Finally, my friend said: "I want to know about the expression 'Like lambs led to slaughter' " – a phrase that comes from Jeremiah 51:40.

The enquiries led me not only to look up the exact sources for these phrases that have become part of the English language, but to the review itself, which I found most entertaining. Not only did it deal with the well-known fact that the English Bible – and especially the King James version of 1611 – had a profound influence on our language, but that it was also the chief vehicle for the democratization of the English populace.

The latter emphasis is important, for it makes it once again clear that Bible reading became widespread from the 18th century on and had a great impact on the development both of English and of North American culture and politics.

"The author's case," says the reviewer, "is that the very warp and woof of popular government was created by the democratization of translated Scripture – that the newly evangelized people obtained from the Bible's teachings a spiritual strength sufficient to help them overcome the tyranny of their arrogant and detached rulers."

This fact may come as a surprise to some of my readers who are unaware of the treasures that the Tanach (the Hebrew Bible) holds for its readers. They know about the Torah, and may have read a good deal of it, but they are hardly aware of the treasures that await them in the rest of the book. We hanker after the latest bestseller, but rarely look at the book that has been the world's bestseller for hundreds of years, and still is to this day. Sad to say, some of you who read these lines probably do not even have a Bible in your homes, and if you do have one, you may not have looked at it for many a moon.

Faulty priorities lead to a bitter aftertaste

Israelis are being killed as Palestinian terrorists blow up buses, Palestinians are firing mortars at Jewish towns, car bombs are exploding in cities, Hezbollah forces in Lebanon are attacking the northern border, Israel's water shortage is more dire than ever, unemployment is worsening and tourists are afraid to visit the country.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Recognizing the people's beleaguered state and with a keen sense of national priorities, Israel's exalted interior minister swings into action to rescue the Jewish soul of the nation. Yet for all his actions, he receives little gratitude from his countrymen – but lots of press.

These are indeed tough times for Israel. They're made even tougher by certain members of the government, especially those from Shas. I admit I've never been a great fan of this strictly Orthodox party and its shenanigans – many of which have landed a disproportionately high number of its Knesset members and other party officials in jail.

Unfortunately, it's hard to ignore Shas politicians. Their mix of religious fervour, political extortion and fanatic subservience to their foul-mouthed spiritual leader has become one of the more disturbing aspects of Israel's ungovernable mosaic of ethnic and special interest parties. The actions of Shas often leave me gagging in revulsion.

Take last month's Pesach holiday, for example. It may already be a distant memory, but thanks to Shas, it left a lingering bitter aftertaste.

With the country under siege and in a near-war situation with the Palestinians, the all-powerful Interior Ministry flexed its muscles, taking a page out of the Parti Québécois book of heavy-handed governing.

Interior Minister Eli Yishai, a senior member of Shas, decided it was high time people stopped eating "illegal" food during Passover. To that end, he deployed 13 inspectors throughout the country to uphold an obscure, useless law forbidding the sale or display of leavened products during the week of Passover. No matter that the law had been virtually unenforced since it was passed 15 years ago.

Restaurants were the prime target of Yishai's "Pesach police," who would arrive unannounced to check for bread and other similar "contraband" on the premises. Those found in violation were slapped with a 100-shekel fine. Like the language inspectors used by Quebec's PQ administration to patrol Montreal for illegally large displays of the much-dreaded English language, the "treatment" is far worse than the original "affliction."

News of the Pesach inspections angered many Israelis, especially from the non-Orthodox majority already embittered by previous cases of religious coercion. To see such a law applied when so many far more consequential ones are not only served to aggravate the rift between the secular and the observant.

In his defence, Yishai insisted he was only upholding the law. How noble on his part! If only he had shown the same steadfastness to enforce laws such as those concerning safety in the work place when he was previously labour and social affairs minister.

Such unnecessary government intervention usually backfires, and with good reason. Even an Orthodox MK from the National Religious Party, Shaul Yahalom, voiced his doubts about the law.

"We have so many other struggles for a Jewish State that are really important," Yahalom said. "It is ridiculous when inspectors go and examine people's personal plates. It won't bring a single person to greater observance of Passover."

His secular counterpart from the Shinui party, Yossi Paritzky, was more outraged. "There is no democracy in the world that allows such enforcement of religious laws," he said. "This is a combination of the Taleban and Iran. It's sheer madness."

For the record, I do not eat bread during Pesach. But I certainly resent any government ministry impinging on my personal freedoms by dictating what people can eat due to religious observance. Forcing people to conform to an Orthodox interpretation of a holiday will only breed more resentment against the religion and those who practise it.

The insult is all the more offensive in view of the endless litany of genuinely grave problems facing the nation that successive governments have so flagrantly ignored for years. Sadly, there's nothing to indicate this is about to change in the future.

Every year, while Israelis and the Jewish people celebrate the re-establishment of Jewish sovereignty in the Land of Israel, the Arabs mark nakba ("catastrophe") day. In the Arab mythology (what academics call a "narrative"), the creation of Israel on what they see as exclusively Palestinian land was the result of a Western imperialist conspiracy, led by the British. Even after 53 years, the vast majority of Palestinians are unable to bring themselves to consider the history of the Jewish links with this land.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Peace, in any meaningful sense, will only come to Israelis, Palestinians and the rest of the Middle East when the Arabs discard these claims. As long as the intellectuals, journalists, political leaders and artists believe and propagate the myths that the Jews are outsiders who have no historic ties or moral rights in Israel, talk of peace is meaningless. The Arab-Israeli conflict will not end until the Palestinians confront the basic facts of history and admit that their own policies and behaviour in rejecting all compromise are responsible for their suffering and "catastrophe."

In the 1930s and after the UN partition resolution of November 1947, the Arabs rejected "the two state solution." At every opportunity, they demanded all of Palestine and exclusive control in Jerusalem. During the Arab occupation between 1948 and 1967, Jewish sites and homes were destroyed and Jews were systematically excluded from this section as part of the effort to rewrite Jewish history.

For 53 years, this basic rejectionism has not changed. As has become totally obvious to even the most enthusiastic supporters, the Oslo agreements were used by the Palestinians to pursue the same old goals. In the Camp David summit that took place last July, Yasser Arafat told Bill Clinton that the First and Second Temples were not in Jerusalem but really near the Dead Sea. Arafat also rejected all proposals to fix the boundaries between Israel and a Palestinian state, in order to preserve the vision of an exclusively Arab state to replace Israel.

The refugee issue, which creates so much support for the Palestinians, is a prime example of the power of this mythology to generate sympathy for the perceived victims. Even in Israel, there are a number of self-styled new historians, who, for various reasons, are also trying to shift the blame to Israel. In 1948, they argue, Israel was not really outnumbered and outgunned, and the forces of the nascent Jewish were actually superior.

Since Israel defeated the five invading Arab armies, it must have done something right, but this effort to change the historical record does not reflect central factors such as motivation and even desperation. The Jews in the Haganah and other defence organizations that united to form the Israel Defence Forces were aware that if they were defeated, this would mark the end of Jewish identity and culture. They were defending their homes and nation, while the Arab armies were invaders with only a distant ideological objective at stake. This was the key factor in explaining the Israeli victory.

The series of wars that the Arabs, including the Palestinians, initiated and waged also created the refugee problem. As in the case of other wars, many civilians fled and others were encouraged to leave by both Israeli and Arab leaders. The details can be debated for many more decades, but the simple (and often ignored) historical fact is that the Arab decision to go to war with the goal of destroying Israel led directly to the flight of the refugees. History cannot be run in reverse, the almost 20,000 Israelis who have died and 80,000 who have been injured in the utterly pointless wars and terrorism cannot be restored to life and health; and the Palestinians must also accept their responsibility for the plight of these refugees.

Until the Palestinians and their supporters acknowledge the Jewish connection with this land, and are willing to listen to our history, there will be no real peace.

The Kirshner File

The gritty world of cartoonist Ben Katchor

Ben Katchor is the master of a fresh literary genre – the literate adult cartoon.

A writer/illustrator whose Yiddish-inflected inkwash comic strips evoke the desperate world of small businessmen in a gritty urban milieu, he is the epitome of eccentricity himself.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Somewhat dishevelled, with the face and eyes of a curious little boy, Katchor enjoys a special relationship with words and pictures.

Syndicated in weekly newspapers and a monthly magazine in the United States, his wry, monochrome comic strips are distinguished by nuanced narratives and delicacy of draftsmanship.

Katchor, 49, is best known for Julius Knipl: Real Estate Photographer and The Jew of New York, which have appeared in book form under the titles of The Beauty Supply District, The Jew of New York and The Cardboard Valise (Random House).

Heir to a rich American tradition of storytelling popularized by the likes of Julius Pfeiffer, Edward Gorey, Will Eisner and Art Speigelman, he has succeeded in catapulting comics, books of cartoons and graphic novels – call them what you may – to an elevated plane.

Asked in a recent interview how he classifies himself, he observed, "There are all kinds of cartoonists. Where do I sit? I'm definitely not part of the mainstream comic strip world. I'm in some literary end of that spectrum."

The subject of a short documentary called Pleasures of Urban Decay, Katchor is virtually in a league of his own. "A publisher once told me there are only six of us in the United States making a living doing adult comic strips," he said. Katchor recalled it was not exactly meant as a compliment. "He was trying to tell me how hard it is."

Katchor is one of those lucky – and talented – few. Thanks to his off-kilter comic strips and a taxable $500,000 grant he received from the MacArthur Foundation last summer, the first cartoonist to be so honoured, he has prospered. He and his wife Susan, a pre-school teacher whom he met in a dairy restaurant, own a flat in Manhattan's rather pricey Upper West Side.

Although The New Yorker and The New York Times have published his drawings, the alternative press is Katchor's real niche. Appearing in eleven cities from New York and San Francisco to Miami and Washington, D.C., his comic strips are published in papers ranging from City Paper to New Times. He also appears in Metropolis, a magazine, and in the English language edition of Forward, a national Jewish newspaper.

His comic strips, the latest of which is entitled Hotel & Farm, cannot be found in Canadian periodicals. "I don't actively solicit newspapers. When they want you, they come to you."

Twenty years ago, when the Brooklyn College graduate with a major in painting was starting out in the business, Katchor tried to break into the mainstream media. "I talked to people at a press syndicate and they said, 'We could never sell your stuff. It's too complicated to read.'"

Today, he agrees with their hard-nosed assessment. "The market demands an effortless read. They didn't think it would fit. It was like vinegar in Coca Cola," he said, grinning.

Katchor's comic strips, as the MacArthur Foundation put it, are informed by "an ironic, compelling and bittersweet nostalgia for the detritus of city life."

The Jew of New York, set in the 19th century, is based on a minor, almost forgotten episode in American history. The magical realist story of the quixotic quest by Mordecai Manuel Noah – a New York journalist and playwright – to establish a Jewish state on an island near Niagara Falls, is the starting point for Katchor's epic tale, which unfolds in the grimy, gray-toned streets of New York City.

Character development in The Jew of New York is rich and reflects Katchor's fascination with individuals on the margins of society. For instance, the character Francis Oriole dreams of carbonating Lake Erie so that he can open a soda water company. Nathan Kishon, a sinful kosher slaughterer, peddles soil from the Holy Land. Yosl Feinbroyt, a Kabbalist, segues into the men's handkerchief trade. Elim-min-opee, a surviving member of Israel's ten lost tribes, performs on Broadway in faultless Hebrew. Their lives intersect amid the hubbub of financial frenzy and crisis.

The Beauty Supply District, which takes place in the present era, turns on Julius Knipl, whose trials and tribulations endear him to a reader.

Peopled with a plethora of hustling salesmen and crafty lawyers, and dotted with curious outposts like the Misspent Youth Centre and Sensum's Symmetry Shop, The Beauty Supply District portrays the quirky ambience of a dingy yet lively metropolis.

Surprisingly, perhaps, Katchor has no proprietary attachment to his characters, be they Knipl or Kishon. "I've invented thousands of them, and they come and go. I try not to establish a continuing character. They're meant to be representations of human beings, not specific people. I never knew anyone like Knipl, though I knew small businessmen."

Ben Katchor

Born in 1951 in Brooklyn's Bedford-Stuyvesant neighbourhood, Katchor hails from an East European Jewish background where Yiddish was the lingua franca.

Meyer, his late father, was an ardent socialist, an upstate New York chicken farmer and hotelier who subsequently operated a rooming house in Brooklyn. A Warsaw Jew, Meyer left Poland about a decade after the end of World War I and lived briefly on agricultural settlements in Palestine and Brazil before settling in the United States in the early 1930s.

"He had far left-wing sympathies and romantic views of the Soviet Union and collectivization. He was very politically-minded, but he was basically a businessman," Katchor recalled.

"They and their friends spoke Yiddish," said Katchor, who claims he is not particularly political. "I learned to read Yiddish after my father's death in 1971. In a pinch, I can communicate in Yiddish, though I don't usually use it. It's not really a language being used nowadays, except in Chassidic circles."

As a child, he devoured comic books, especially Spiderman. "Comics were my first exposure to representational drawing. I was drawn to them even before I learned to read. Some of my earliest memories are of reading the Sunday newspaper comics," Katchor said.

Katchor drew his first comic strip before he was 10. "I liked the idea of drawn images of the world, the colours, the lines, the concept of a visual world on paper. I was conscious that there was a profession behind those comic strips."

After graduating from Brooklyn College, he set up a graphic design and typesetting company with two friends in lower Manhattan, the venue of all his comic strips."I wasn't happy as a businessman, though it could be amusing," he said.

In the mid-1980s, when publishers were still in the habit of dismissing the adult comic strip as a mere fad, he founded Picture Story, a self-published zine. Then he submitted drawings to Raw, a cutting-edge magazine run by Spiegelman of Maus fame.

He confesses that he never had a serious interest in painting. "If I had been a painter, my work would have ended up in galleries, which was not where I wanted to be."

Seeking far wider exposure, he sent his drawings to newspapers. He sold his first comic strip, revolving around Knipl, to The New York Press in 1988. By 1992, he had broken into Forward.

Katchor was taken by total surprise when he won the coveted MacArthur grant. "It was unexpected. You never know who's being nominated. It was a strange occurrence, like stepping off a curb and being hit by a truck."

Has it changed his life? "It's too soon to know," said Katchor, the recipient of a 1995 Guggenheim fellowship. "But now I'm invited to speak at more prestigious institutions (he was brought here by The Beguiling Comix Shop, and spoke at the University of Toronto), "and when people look at my work, they say, 'There must be something to it.' "

Currently, Katchor is putting the finishing touches to another collection of The Cardboard Valise. And in September, the Jewish Museum in New York City will host a retrospective of his drawings.

In the meantime, he'll continue churning out his comic strips in a relentless routine. "I never stop working," he said. "I'm working as we speak, which is pretty insane. I put in more hours than a lot of small businessmen, that's for sure."

Jews, Christians remember Holocaust victims

By HEATHER CHEIFETZ
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Members of the Jewish and Christian communities came together recently at Holy Rosary Church in Toronto, to honour and remember those who died during the Holocaust.

"The Holocaust demonstrates the power of gossip, hearsay and myth," Rev. Telmor Sartison, Bishop of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Canada, told the packed audience at the 21st annual Christian Service in memory of the Holocaust. "It is the dark night of the human soul."

The key to preventing similar tragedies, he added, is to make "understanding your neighbour a priority."

The Lachan Jewish Chamber Choir, led by Cantor Ben Maissner of Holy Blossom Temple, integrated traditional Jewish melodies into the Christian service, including a stirring rendition of the Mourner's Kaddish.

Six candles were lit in remembrance of the six million Jews who perished. A seventh represented the Righteous Gentiles who risked their lives to rescue Jews.

Several members of the community were invited to light candles, including Holocaust survivors Tilly Sugarman, Marcus Verwoerd, Elisabeth deJong-Feldman and her husband Irwin Bremmer; Sam Romberg, a Jewish Canadian Forces veteran who liberated Holland; Justin Afazali, a survivor of Rwandan genocide; and Ada Wynston, who was hidden by Christian families during the war.

Born in Amsterdam, Wynston was separated from her family at age six. She spent four years hiding in Christian families' homes, before being reunited with her father, brother and sister in 1947.

Wynston, who co-organized the event, has been involved with the Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto for 12 years. She also works with the Holocaust Education Committee, speaking regularly to students about her experiences. "We have to keep the spirit of dialogue alive," she said.

More than 150 people attended the service, including Toronto City Councillor Joe Mihevc, German Consul General Christiane Geissler-Kuss and Israeli Consul General Meir Romem.

Pastor Paul McGill of Holy Rosary Church has been a member of the Christian-Jewish Dialogue for eight years.

"It struck me shortly after I moved here that there is a large Jewish population living in the area," he said. "I thought that it was important to get to know our neighbours."

Pastor McGill has made it a priority to attend several co-sponsored events each year, while encouraging members of his church to do the same. "Partly because my congregants know I'm so involved, they have been very supportive."

The Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto was founded 33 years ago and continues to thrive.

"We'll never agree on our fundamental differences – we are Jews, they are Christians – but the reality is that there is a better understanding of each other than ever before," said David Hart, one of the original members of the Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto, who remains a board member today.

There is certainly more sympathy and understanding towards the Holocaust, he added. "Of course, there are still deniers. In the past, after some of our events we find anti-Semitic flyers and posters. Sometimes we receive threatening letters. But the main thing is that we continue to meet."

Renovated Toronto Mikvah to be inaugurated

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The newly renovated Toronto Mikvah will be inaugurated with a program at the Inn on the Park, May 13 at 8 p.m.

The event will feature educator Zahava Braunstein, who will speak on The Uniqueness of the Jewish Home. Braunstein is the principal of Bet Yaacov Ateret Torah High School in New York, and the program director at Camp Shira. She has taught the laws of marriage and family purity for nearly 30 years.

A mikvah is used by women for the observance of the laws of family purity, taharat hamishpachah. A woman is not permitted to engage in marital relations with her husband during her menstrual period or for seven days after it, and until she has immersed in a mikvah.

The Toronto Mikvah, which is on Sheppard Avenue just west of Bathurst Street, was opened in June 1969. It was one of the first to be built as an independent entity, not attached to a synagogue or a steam bath, as most were in the early days of the century.

Myer Nussbaum, who is active in the administration of the mikvah, said renovations were necessary because the mikvah has been used so much.

"At first, I remember that only 60 or 70 women used it a year. Then it went up to about 120, and now over 600 use it," he told The CJN.

This is because of the increasing size of the Orthodox community and the fact that more women observe the laws of family purity, according to George Hofstedter, who was largely responsible for the renovations.

The building was almost completely gutted to its shell, he said. Because it couldn't be closed completely during the construction, the whole process took close to a year.

Much of the $1-million cost of renovation is what Hofstedter calls hidden – the mechanical and ventilation system on the roof. The roof also houses an apparatus that contains rainwater, because to fulfil halachic requirements, a mikvah must be filled to a large extent with water from natural sources.

The renovation had to be inspected many times, not only by municipal building inspectors, but also by community rabbis, who, Hofstedter said, climbed ladders up to the roof to make sure that all the halachic requirements were adhered to.

The building was expanded to include four new bathrooms, which means there are now 14. There are also seven mikvot, some in the bathrooms themselves, and some as the central point of several bathrooms.

"Everything is done to ensure privacy and comfort," he said.

There is a new waiting area, an enhanced security system with a video monitor to the outside and a buzzer, a commercial laundry room ("everyone is given a complete set of towels and so on") and a hair drying room.

The staff has also been expanded, Hofstedter said.

The people most responsible for having had the Toronto Mikvah built in the first place, Nussbaum said, were the late Rabbi Gedaliah Felder and the late Israel Koschitsky, as well as other individuals who recognized that the community was moving north. In fact, when it opened, its predecessor downtown on College Street closed.

The Guita Rosenfield Endowment Fund, which will be inaugurated at the upcoming celebration, will be used for ongoing repair and maintenance of the mikvah.

Possible changes to immigrant services discussed

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Although there has been some "uncertainty" over the potential effects on the Toronto office of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) of a possible restructuring by Toronto's Jewish federation of its services to immigrants, JIAS' executive director, Jack Kugelmass, is confident that JIAS "will exist no matter what happens."

His comments follow the creation of a committee by UJA FEDERATION and JIAS Toronto to look "at ways of more closely integrating Toronto's JIAS into the federation system and improving the help it provides," as a recent federation news release put it.

What that means, according to Howard English, the federation's director of marketing and communications, is that some of the services provided by JIAS – an independent beneficiary within the federation system – could in theory be provided by other agencies in conjunction with JIAS. He doesn't believe there is much duplication of service as things stand now.

The impetus for creating the committee, which was a federation initiative, was a change in the funding arrangements for the agency, to be implemented July 1.

Instead of the money for the Toronto and Montreal offices of JIAS coming from UIA Federations Canada, it will now come directly from the federations of the respective cities. JIAS Canada will serve immigrants only in cities other than Toronto and Montreal, under the auspices of UIAFC.

All three offices – those of JIAS, UIAFC and the Federation – are housed in the Lipa Green building.

The change does not affect the dollar funding – it uses the same UJA campaign money, but now channeled via a different route.

Roughly half of the $1 million budget of JIAS Toronto comes from UJA FEDERATION; the rest is government funding.

The 79-year-old agency, which deals with over 700 new immigrant families per year, is "the lead agency in providing settlement and immigration services to Toronto's Jewish community," said Kugelmass.

"From the JIAS perspective, that role and the extent of that role is now being reviewed by one of its funders."

No plans have been put on the table, Kugelmass said, but "there are some who believe that perhaps JIAS, because it's a smaller agency, should be absorbed...to benefit from economies of scale."

English said that JIAS would "most probably" remain an independent agency. Eliminating it altogether was "an option but not one that's been recommended," he said.

The committee, which was slated to meet this week, aims to "extend an even greater degree of assistance to newcomers as well as integrating the already settled immigrant community by drawing JIAS more fully into the UJA FEDERATION family," said committee chair Natan Aronshtam in a news release.

The services provided by the community to immigrants "will not be diminished in any way," he added.

JIAS Toronto already has ties to other local federation-funded agencies such as Jewish Family & Child Service, working with immigrant youngsters in schools, and to Jewish Vocational Services, to which it refers some 500 clients a year.

In Montreal, where Kugelmass serves as interim director of the local JIAS office, FEDERATION CJA has decided to create a JIAS welcome centre to be housed in its Snowdon Y.

The project, which is expected to open in the next couple of months, was over a year in the making and will involve "significant increased collaboration with different agencies," said Kugelmass. "It will be kind of a one-stop shopping for new immigrants coming to Montreal."

Yes, the model could work in Toronto too, Kugelmass speculated, in answer to a question.

Federal census an important planning tool: Ronen

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Count yourself in.

That's the message Jewish communal leaders have for those who may hesitate or be turned off by next week's census question on religion.

While many may feel that inquiring about someone's faith isn't anyone's business, let alone the federal government's, Canadian Jewish Congress is urging people to answer.

"There's no obligation to answer them if people feel they are intrusive or personal," said former CJC president Moshe Ronen, "But they're a very important tool for community planning."

Last year, Ronen and other Jewish leaders wrote to Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, cabinet members and MPs, asking that the questions on religion and ethnic origins be retained on this census because they provide communal planners with a treasure trove of data.

Omitting the queries would have constituted "a serious error," communal leaders stated. "One cannot underestimate the value of the responses to these questions."

Over the years, data gleaned from responses to the religion and ethnicity questions have provided Jewish planners with invaluable information on education levels, migration, income, labour, poverty, family structure and living arrangements, and immigration. Numbers have also yielded data on levels of intermarriage and patterns of religious identification.

Distribution of census questionnaires began May 1. "Census Day" is May 15, when forms should be mailed back.

Eighty percent of Canadians will receive a short form consisting of seven questions per person. The other 20 percent will receive the long form of 51 questions for every person in the household.

The question on religion, which is only on the long form, simply asks, "What is this person's religion?" Only one denomination may be specified.

The question on ethnic background, which is also only on the long form, asks, "To which ethnic or cultural group(s) did this person's ancestor's belong?" Respondents are allowed to list up to four ethnic backgrounds, Jewish being one.

Statistics Canada has considered "Jewish" to be both a religion and ethnicity for decades. No other ethnicity or faith falls into both categories.

Censuses in years ending with "1" have asked about religion and ethnic background since 1901. Headcounts in years ending with 6 – so called "mini-censuses" – inquire about ethnicity only.

The 1991 census found 318,070 Canadians who said their religion was Jewish, and 369,565 who listed Jewish as their ethnic origin.

But communal planners relied on neither tally. They used a mix of both derived by experts at McGill University in Montreal. The blend excluded only those who claimed Jewish ethnic origins but professed another religion.

The final number – the official one – was 356,315 in Canada as of 1991, with 162,605 of them in Toronto.

This time, officials at McGill University have not been asked to interpret the results.

"I haven't been retained," said Prof. James Torczyner, who has been analyzing Jewish data from censuses since 1971.

Several factors have to be considered, he said, chiefly, immigration and the birthrate. Between 1981 and 1991, the Jewish birthrate increased, while the overall Canadian birthrate went down.

As well, there are more Jewish elderly than in the general population, and they tend to live longer, Torczyner said.

In the past, Jewish academics have clashed on the meaning of the numbers, with some arguing that the presence of more "ethnic" Jews than "religious" ones should sound alarm bells because they reflect rising rates of assimilation.

Following the 1996 headcount, Prof. Robert Brym of the University of Toronto expressed concern at how many more "ethnic" Jews had listed multiple ethnic origins, compared to the 1991 census.

> Forms should be mailed back May 15

At the time, Brym said the trend reflected increased assimilation because more and more Canadians were identifying themselves as Jewish but also as having several other origins.

Brym now says he's moderated that view.

"One interpretation is that Jews are getting assimilated, but a more accurate one is the feeling that they are just more comfortable, and that they're recognizing their roots," he said.

Jewish Canadians have become more integrated into society and are perhaps "re-interpreting" Judaism, Brym stated.

He too declined to predict what this census might show.

Brym conceded that the final number will be up over 1991, and that immigration will tell a big story.

"Immigration from Russia has dried up. Immigration from South Africa has tapered off. But being Jewish is more fashionable than it used to be. Listing it as an ethnicity inflates the numbers. So we can expect some increase."

One thing is all but certain: Islam is expected to overtake Judaism as the largest non-Christian religion in Canada.

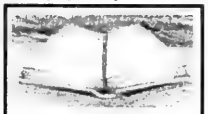
What's in a name? Everything



Rabbinic Reflections

They say, "It's all in the name." Companies spend millions of dollars in research, not just on product development, but in the search for an appropriate product name. Certain names project certain images which can make it or break it in the marketplace. In other words, a name or phrase is much more than a bunch of letters.

The different names of God denote the Almighty in different modes with humankind. Each holiday has a variety of names denoting a different essence of both history and memory. We know that the choice of a name for a newlyborn is a most complex experience, and the change of a name denotes a serious situation or circumstance.

The importance of names is especially true in the Torah where words and phrases have a multitude of meanings, ranging from the plain translation (pshat) to a multitude of interpretations (drash). Even the names of the portions are more than titles. Often their proximity and sequencing bring another message to light above and beyond its content. For instance, in the past two weeks, we have read three portions. Each stands by itself with profound content, such as the laws of Yom Kippur, sexuality, a complex moral and ethical code, the festivals and much more. If only for this, we would say dayeinu.

But if we look at the names of the portions, a whole new dimension is introduced. "Acharai mot kedoshim emor" literally means "after the death of the righteous, say." This title is cryptic and seemingly contradictory because dead people don't talk. But not so. All too often, it is "acharai mot" – after the death of a person or the end of a relationship – that we realize "kedoshim" – their virtues and special qualities that we never appreciated. At that point is the "emor;" we want to say, but, alas, it is too late. Time and circumstance have taken away any opportunity to say and do the things that could have been and should have been done.

Thoughts and feelings normally reserved for eulogies and epitaphs should be written and spoken during a lifetime, when sentiments can be acknowledged and appreciated. Most appropriately, we recite the Aishet Chayil, lauding the virtues of our spouse every Friday in the presence of family and friends, rather than at the funeral.

Maybe that is why these portions are invariably followed by Mother's Day and soon after by Father's Day. Hopefully, the sequence of these portions will kickstart people into making as many days as possible become days of meaningful relationships and experiences with parents and children and siblings and friends while all are alive and well. The ability to make most days – a mother's day or a father's day – into genuine people days – becomes the real barometer of the quality and purpose of life.

But while respecting and honouring others are important, this is only one-half of the equation. The most neglected piece is the challenge to be the mother or father or spouse or child or friend you know you ought to be or could be, to conduct yourself in a way that brings honour to your various roles – not to play the roles, but to in fact be them – with sincerity and integrity.

No, it is not always convenient or even comfortable, but it is who you are. When you honour that essence within yourself, you can begin to appreciate the same qualities in others. If you can accomplish that in the course of a lifetime, then the "kedoshim," the purpose of your being will itself be "emor," will speak for itself.

What's in a name? Everything... one's entire lifetime.

The biology of religion

Why God Won't Go Away, Brain Science and the Biology of Belief*, by Andrew Newberg, Eugene D'Aquilli and Vince Rause, Random House $37.95

Books
Bernard Baskin

Through the ages, philosophers, theologians, psychologists – and a multitude of searchers for truth and understanding – have asked this question: "Why do humans always long to connect with some force, power or spirit larger than themselves?" To put it another way, why does consciousness inexorably involve men and women – no matter how far we go back in time – in a spiritual quest? Why does some belief in God or religious faith seem inevitable and universal?

Doctors Andrew Newberg and Eugene D'Aquilli are prominent scientists, university professors and longtime students of religion. Rejecting customary answers to complex and difficult questions such as the above, they offer an explanation based on their research that is profoundly simple, but, they assert, scientifically valid: the religious impulse is rooted in the biology of the brain.

After years of scientific study and careful consideration of the results, the authors conclude that there is evidence of a neurological process which has evolved over time; it allows human beings to transcend material existence and acknowledge and connect with a deeper, more spiritual part of themselves. "Even the profound spiritual experiences described by saints and mystics of every religion, and in every period of time, can also be attributed to the brain's activity that gives ritual its transcendent powers."

The book's first 50 pages are devoted to brain architecture and machinery. This material is rather technical and not quickly absorbed. I learned that there is a network of structures situated towards the middle of the brain called the limbic system, which comprises the deep parts of the temporal lobes (the lobes that are situated at the temples), nuclei called the amygdala.

Information gathered by the senses is normally routed through the thalamus, a small subsection deep within the brain, to the sensory cortex, which analyzes it in detail to decide how much weight it should be given. Sensory information processed by the cortex finally reaches the amygdala, which contribute the emotional portion of our response to sensory stimuli. Parts of the amygdala, for example, are involved in fear. Animals with damage to these parts are no longer perturbed by stimuli they previously learned to fear.

In the 1930s, when Montreal neurosurgeon Wilder Penfield stimulated the temporal lobes during brain surgery, his patients experienced sudden visions or tastes, or heard voices of relatives, or felt a strong sense of being in the presence of an external intelligence. Recent researchers in the field have achieved similar results.

The conclusion the authors draw from this fund of knowledge is that "every event that happens to us or any action that we take can be associated with activity in one or more specific regions of the brain. This includes, necessarily, all religious and spiritual experiences. The evidence further compels us to believe that if God does indeed exist, the only place he can manifest his existence would be in the tangled neural pathways and physiological structures of the brain."

Does all of this mean that the human brain is wired to induce religious feeling, the desire for myth and ritual, and even mysticism? Perhaps. But the evidence doesn't show that the feelings and emotions produced are necessarily logical, intelligent or benign. This same brain must be the source of the sheerest religious superstition and nonsense. It produces feelings that drive religious people to intolerance, hatred and bloodshed. Not all persons who undergo religious experience and sensations achieve what the authors call "oneness with the universe."

Nonetheless, this work, written with the help of the journalist Vince Rause, is stimulating and groundbreaking, if somewhat frightening. It is the only work of its kind that I know of that so explicitly probes the biology of religious experience.

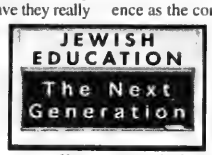
Jewish Life

Faith, doubt and Jewish education

By ELLIOT MALAMET

Another end to the school year looms, and my inevitable feeling of having utterly failed my students surfaces yet again, an annual rite of passage no less unsettling for all its grinding repetitiveness.

What have they really learned, my inner voice laments, how have they really changed? The old half-true clichés rush to fill the breach of this insidious hole in my self-confidence and chatter the usual platitudes: "You're planting a seed which will bear fruit in later years, you never know how you affect people, Judaism is a powerful message."



But uncertainty lingers and the reasons for doing what we do grow blurry in the haze of ineffective attempts to urgently impress upon anyone who will listen that Torah's true, Torah's good, Torah's real. Perhaps the most skeptical ear, the least cajoled mind privy to this blaring advertisement, is my own.

It occurs to me that my own existential ambivalence is ironically the key education tool I possess. The Buddhist scholar Stephen Batchelor has addressed this simply and convincingly: "Doubt is central to the spiritual crisis many people find themselves in today. The beliefs of traditional religion having been undermined; it is often doubt that we experience as the core of our spiritual awareness. Such doubt is not merely uncertainty about the claims of a particular spiritual tradition, but doubt about what is the meaning of our existence in this world... Faith is not equivalent to mere belief. Faith is the condition of ultimate confidence that we have the capacity to follow the path of doubt to its end."

The core issues of faith and doubt that bewitch all modern people – self-consciously or otherwise – are also the beginning of a genuine religious discourse with others. The topic cannot be broached with all students nor can it be raised at all times, for it requires a commitment on the part of those involved to tenaciously examine their own beliefs and prejudices, and the maturity to "put away childish things."

Belief in a God and the life that may accompany such a belief remains the ultimate path of Jewish spirituality, and the sidetracks to this road are endless. In many ways the largest detour may be religion as it is currently practised, education as it is presently offered. Each student – and what is a teacher if not the most perennial and watchful of students? – must have the courage to cultivate the conditions under which faith and doubt can be expressed, shared, transformed.

The peak moments of a life are not the true breeding ground for the daily obstacle course of belief. The Kotzker Rebbe once wryly commented on the midrashic statement that at the giving of the Torah at Sinai, the prophetic ability of an ordinary maidservant surpassed even that of Ezekiel. True, said the Kotzker, but on the day after, the maidservant will return to being just that. To be able to sustain our Jewish lives in the cauldron of modernity will require not the clarivoyance of prophets but the paradoxical faith to doubt and the will to endure.

Learn about Lag b'Omer

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

How can one day be a reminder of Judaism's links to mysticism, a time to mourn and a time to dance, and an Israeli pilgrimage that is reminiscent at times of Woodstock?

Lag b'Omer is all of those things and more, as we will see on the Jewish Highway. The seven-week period between Passover and Shavuot is a time of semi-mourning but on the 33rd day, Lag b'Omer, weddings are permitted and the day is celebrated with bonfires, parties and haircuts. This year Lag b'Omer begins May 10, in the evening.

If Lag b'Omer is identified with one person, it must be Rabbi Shimon Bar Yochai. Rabbi Shimon was a student of Rabbi Akiva and one of the very few scholars to survive during the Roman conquest of Jerusalem 1,900 years ago. The Aish Hatorah Web site explains how Rabbi Shimon and his son sought refuge and studied Torah in a cave for 12 years [aish.com/holidays/counting_the_omer/lag_bomer.asp]. Rabbi Shimon is believed to have died on Lag b'Omer, but just before his death he revealed the Zohar, Judaism's great kabbalistic work to his students.

One of the most popular Lag b'Omer traditions is to light bonfires. The Ohr Somayach site explains why [www.ohr.org.il/special/omer/light.htm]. "On the day of Rabbi Shimon's passing, a great light was revealed to his students when he uncovered many of the hidden secrets of the Torah. This was written down in the Zohar [lit. shining]. The bonfires symbolize the light of the hidden wisdom that Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai revealed on Lag b'Omer."

Some of the biggest bonfires take place in Meron, a small town in northern Israel. Meron is also believed to be the burial place of Rabbi Shimon, so every year, it becomes the focus of a mass pilgrimage as tens of thousands of Jews come to celebrate, dance and even do a little business. There are several marvelous Web sites that capture the mood of the trip to Meron. I particularly like the way Virtual Jerusalem describes the scene as "Mea She'arim Meets Woodstock: 'Meron quickly assumes a festive atmosphere quite unlike any other. In the woods around town, campsites are filled with mainly Sephardi Jews. Some tents have televisions, electricity and running water. The fragrance of roasting shish-kebab wafts upwards toward the tombs. Some have the custom to make a seudat hodayah [thanksgiving meal] and to slaughter a lamb and roast it.'" [207.168.91.4/vjholidays/lagbaomer/].

You can find more first person accounts about the trip to Meron at Shema Yisrael [www.shemayisrael.co.il/jerbooks/meron/meron1.htm] and at Aviva Starkman's site [www.starkman.com/aviva/AJS/lag_baomer.html].

And for something different, follow Maria Goldrich as she joins the ancient Lag b'Omer pilgrimage on the Tunisian island of Djerba [www.kolot.com/djerba.shtml].

There are several great Lag b'Omer sites aimed at kids such as the one from Jewish Theological Seminary [learn.jtsa.edu/topics/kids/together/lagbaomer/]. In addition to the history of the day, there are rabbinic tales, quizzes and essays to spark discussions. Over at Orthodox Union, there are links to a Lag b'Omer song and poem, and an explanation of why the day is associated with playing bows and arrows [www.ou.org/chagim/lagbaomer/default.html].

The National Jewish Committee on Scouting has even created an entire bonfire lighting ceremony which focuses on the historical relationship Jews have had with fire (the Menorah, Shabbat lights, God's holy fire in the Wilderness and the Shoah.) [www.jewishscouting.org/other/lag_bonfire.html]

For most Israelis, Lag b'Omer is a great day to get out, have a picnic and throw a few potatoes on the fire. But if you'd like to prepare something a bit more exotic, there are a few sites with other suggestions. Daniel Rogov's Lag b'Omer picnic menu boasts Spinach Salad with Honey and Oranges followed by Chicken and Artichoke Salad topped off by Arak Cookies [www.stratsplace.com/rogov/israel/lag_ba_omer.html]. Over at KosherKorner, they're dining on Papaya Slaw, Sweet and Spicy Chicken with Tropical Fruits and Lentil Salad with Lemon [www.fspronet.com/kosherkorner/lagbomer.html].

I normally don't concentrate on news stories but here's one I want to share. An Israeli computer programmer may have made history by changing his own from Tomer Krissi to Tomer.com. At first, Israel's Foreign Ministry didn't approve the change because names couldn't have punctuation marks. But Tomer, 25, found there was nothing to prevent the change. So why did .com do it? "I see surnames, which have meaning as archeological artifacts, and I wanted to give mine some significance for myself in 2001." [www.gsnonweb.com/gsnlib_a/gsn2001/2001_04/20010410/96277.html]

Interest in Yiddish literature remains strong, says Lansky

By BEN ROSE
Special to CJN

TORONTO — The ongoing renewal of interest in Jewish literature will keep Yiddish alive despite the attractions of mainstream culture and high rates of assimilation and intermarriage, said Aaron Lansky, executive director of the National Yiddish Book Centre.

"Yiddish will say the last word in a way we can't perceive," Lansky said at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, where he delivered the J.B. Salsberg Memorial Lecture to a packed house that included members of Salsberg's family.

"The appreciation of Yiddish culture has increased by quantum leaps," Lansky said, adding that Jewish youth often consider it "cool" to study Yiddish.

The future of Yiddish is in events like the Ashkenaz festival to be held in Toronto next year, he said.

Lansky tempered his affirmation of faith in Yiddish with the "bad news" that 99 percent of the people who donate books to his centre cannot read Yiddish, and donations come from the children and grandchildren of the owners, who now live in the suburbs. Of every 200 books given to the centre, 119 are still not translated into English or other languages.

His "good news" included statements that "loads of Jewish youth" are now listening to klezmer music and that his centre received 800 applications for eight positions as summer interns.

While every major university in the United States and Canada has a Jewish studies program, and many public schools have Holocaust studies in their curriculum, Lansky expressed dismay that "there is no sense of Jewish history" in the Holocaust courses.

He also said he is doubtful as to whether widely sponsored Birthright programs providing visits to Israel by Jewish youth will help keep Yiddish alive.

Warning against reducing Jewish day school programs to "spiritualization," he said more than religion is involved. "The visceral attraction to Jewish literature is at the gut level."

Every major university in the United States, Canada and Israel is now teaching Yiddish, and Yiddish day schools are beginning to appear. The centre has collected 1.5 million Yiddish books and placed them in 450 universities.

Since they have no use for Yiddish literature, chassidic Jews, though they have large families and do speak Yiddish, do not represent a hope for the future, said Lansky, who also spoke at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre later in the day.

Furthermore, though the rate of intermarriage in the United States is now more than 50 percent, he said he is surprised it is not even higher, considering how Jews have adopted the American way of life.

Toronto is one of the few cities in North America where Yiddish culture is still flourishing, and Lansky said he always likes to visit here. Yiddish suffers "a sense of marginalization" in other places.

In a talk laced with humor, he said he was watching the reaction of eight summer interns at his centre while they listened to a speaker on Jewish humour. "Seven interns didn't laugh at the jokes and the other came from Mexico."

At a Yiddish theatre festival in Montreal (Lansky took a course at McGill University), he heard two waves of laughter, one at the original Yiddish, and a second when Yiddish speakers translated the words for their friends.

Edith Cooper, chair of the Yiddish committee of UJA FEDERATION, co-sponsor of the lecture, said the event was undertaken in connection with its celebration of 1,000 years of Yiddish. The Salsberg Foundation made the lecture possible.

Papers of the late politician will be given to Queen's University, Kingston, announced Sharyn Salsberg Ezrin, his granddaughter. Queen's has agreed to study the "larger than life" career of her grandfather, she said.

Dr. Wulf Grobin remembered as a Zionist and 'super mensch'

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Dr. Wulf Grobin was a warm, compassionate man, a staunch supporter of Zionism and Jewish values, and a great doctor.

Most of all, he was a super mensch, said Dr. Michael Gordon, vice-president of medical services and head of geriatrics and internal medicine at Baycrest Centre.

Grobin was founder of the Canadian chapter of the Israel Medical Association and former physician in charge at the diabetes clinic at Mount Sinai Hospital. He died recently at the age of 89.

Obituary

Born in Riga, Latvia, Grobin, the youngest of three children, studied Torah, Talmud, history and philosophy, and attended cheder daily.

He went on to attend medical school in Switzerland, and participated in the 1930 World Zionist Congress as an aide-de-camp to Chaim Weizmann, who became the first president of Israel, said Carol Epstein, a friend and Israel Medical Association (IMA) volunteer.

After serving in the armoured division of the Latvian army, Grobin pursued postgraduate training in London. It was there that he met his wife of over 50 years, Fay, who died in 1991.

Soon after his arrival in Toronto in 1957, Grobin began initiating many Israel-oriented projects – including the sending of medical textbooks to Israel, establishing the Retired Physicians' Home outside of Jerusalem, and the building of the Medical Library in Jerusalem.

Dr. Wulf Grobin

In the mid-70s, Grobin was asked by Keren Hayesod to assist in the building of a field hospital on the Lebanese border at Kibbutz Misgav Am because of the lives that had been lost along that border, Epstein said.

The field hospital was completed one year later with the support of many volunteers, including more than 200 physicians representing every hospital and clinic across Toronto.

It has since been used to save the lives of children wounded by Fatah incursions in northern Israel, Epstein said.

After unsuccessfully trying to help his own family reach Canada before the war, Grobin took it upon himself to assist survivors of the Holocaust fill out the documentation required to file claims for restitution, she said.

Grobin's parents survived the war in Siberia, where his father, a tailor, was taken to make uniforms for the Russian army. Afterwards, they moved to Haifa, Israel.

Before Grobin moved to Toronto, he first settled in Newfoundland because he felt that was where doctors were needed most.

"In the early years of his practice, Grobin could be seen at night jumping into his rubber dinghy with only a small lantern to light his way as he raced to the aid of a birthing mother, an appendectomy or some other medical crisis," Epstein said.

"He travelled by horse and buggy to small towns outside St. John's, and even by dog sled to the remote regions of snow-bound north Newfoundland."

When his son needed to go to school, they moved to St. John's. While there, Grobin helped to build the Hebrew school.

"Grobin would often tell stories of his Newfoundland experiences and many would find themselves riveted because of his insight, humour, and his ability to make good clinical observations," Gordon said.

"When I first arrived in Canada 25 years ago, Grobin was the most welcoming, warm, supportive and knowledgeable person that a new member of the staff would ever want to meet."

Gordon, who is also a professor of medicine at the University of Toronto added that "at Baycrest, Grobin introduced a program for diabetic control based on lifestyle, diet and the appropriate use of medications that has become the standard of long-term care in North America.

"In over 20 years of working with him, I was impressed by his humanity and his caring nature," Gordon said. "And I dearly miss him."

Accompanied by Ida Parsons, a longtime friend, Grobin spent the last few years of his life re-visiting the many countries where he had lived, Epstein said.

"Friends would travel all night by train just to meet him for a few hours," Parsons noted.

Grobin, who is survived by his son Michael, was staff physician, fellow in research and consultant in diabetes at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

After his retirement, Grobin founded the Fay Florence Grobin Memorial Fund. This year's symposium titled, Controversies in Medical Ethics: Jewish, Secular and Legal Perspectives will take place at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care on June 8th.

In addition, a memorial lecture for Grobin will be given by Dr. Robert Josse on June 14 at Baycrest. For information, call the IMA 416-781-9562.

Anti-drug crusader killed in drinking-driving accident

Addressed students all over North America

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The irony of Shane Okorofsky's death was monstrous.

Okorofsky was a recovering alcoholic and drug addict who lectured youngsters on the evils of substance abuse.

The teenaged driver of the car that killed him in a crash last month has been charged with drunk driving.

Okorofsky was remembered as a compassionate, caring young man who rid himself of his demons after a harrowing youth.

Though only 26 when he died April 22, Okorofsky had been clean and sober for nearly a decade.

"He came from a very loving home. It's remarkable how much love he had for everyone," said his stepmother, Carol Okorofsky. "He had an open heart."

The family has made a point of urging Jewish addicts to abandon their shame and denial and come forward for help.

Okorofsky's father, Stanley, a prominent Toronto dentist, struggled with chemical dependence following a skiing accident.

"The decade of his troubles obviously took a toll on Shane," said Carol Okorofsky. "People in the Jewish community should not be ashamed if they have problems."

"He was absolutely wonderful," said Marla Goldman, a longtime friend. "He served in any capacity he could."

Okorofsky addressed students all over North America, urging them not to repeat his mistakes. He connected with them instantly, Goldman said. "They listened to him. He was meant to work with kids."

He also spoke about his addictions to prisoners. He was one of the main speakers for Renascent, an organization that fights drug addiction and alcohol abuse through public awareness and education.

Goldman, the co-ordinator of JACS Toronto, the 12-step group for Jewish alcoholics and drug addicts, said Okorofsky was helping her set up a teen program of JACS. That program will now be re-named in his memory, she said.

Obituary

Okorofsky was a troubled youth but retained a sensitivity, eulogized Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld at the funeral. He grew up at Rabbi Bielfeld's synagogue, Temple Emanu-El, and had his bar mitzvah and was confirmed there.

"Hell may be an apt metaphor for much of Shane's life," Rabbi Bielfeld stated. "We know from his early years [that] Shane was a user and later, an alcoholic. So much of his world centred on AA and the extended family Alcoholics Anonymous provided him."

He "could never do enough for you. He was one of the most good-natured guys I've ever met. Shane needed to be needed. He would go to hell and back to help us with our needs."

Dec. 1 was a special day for Okorofsky: The anniversary of his being clean. He marked the day last year by visiting the grave of his mother, Pam, who died a few years ago of cancer.

For several weeks, Okorofsky had been staying with his grandfather, helping him recover from surgery. The young man had lined up his own apartment, and was slated to move in just a few weeks.

He had also been offered a job at a treatment and rehab centre in Texas but couldn't accept it for health reasons.

On that fateful Sunday night, Okorofsky and a friend were returning from an AA meeting when a car struck theirs. He was pronounced dead at the scene, and his friend is still in hospital.

Donations in Okorofsky's memory can be made to JACS through Jewish Family & Child Service.

Meantime, Anna Kats, 19, of Toronto, will appear in court May 28 to face charges of impaired driving causing death, and other traffic-related offences.

Eitz Chaim Girls School to honour retiring principal

TORONTO — Rabbi Leibush Adler, retiring principal of Eitz Chaim Girls School, is being honoured with a dinner at Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation in Thornhill on May 16 at 6:30 p.m.

Guest speaker at the event is Rabbi Joshua Fishman, national director of Torah Umesorah, the umbrella organization for the 600 affiliated Hebrew day schools of North America.

Rabbi Adler and his entire immediate family were deported to Auschwitz, and he was the sole survivor. After the war, he studied at the yeshiva of Kaschau in Slovakia, and later at the Sorbonne in Paris.

In 1950, Rabbi Adler came to Toronto, and began to work as a teacher at Eitz Chaim's Hebrew department. He was subsequently promoted to principal.

In 1955, he married Bluma Luria, who has taught at Eitz Chaim for 45 years. She is also being honoured at the event.

For more information or reservations, call Rabbi Avram Rothman, 905-764-6633 or fax 905-764-9577.

TORONTO — For Rabbi Aubrey Glazer, the Stephen Cooper Award, with which he was presented recently for leadership and commitment to community, is not just an award.

"I felt if I was going to take his memory as a blessing, I wanted to know a few things about him," said the 30-year-old rabbi, who was ordained last year from the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS) and has almost a dozen academic awards to his credit.

Rabbi Aubrey Glazer

He learned that Cooper, who died in 1988 at age 18, was "caring, warm, sensitive, brilliant, introspective and loved languages." Particularly with respect to the latter two qualities, Rabbi Glazer connected.

An introspective type himself, the rabbi has an eclectic background including a year's study of architecture and an undergraduate degree in French language and literature.

In his downtown, book-filled flat, posters decorating the kitchen walls attest to an earlier career as a student filmmaker, while a stick of incense burns in a holder on the counter.

A student for the dozen years since his graduation from Claude Watson School for the Arts, Rabbi Glazer is now pursuing a PhD in Jewish thinking and poetics at the University of Toronto. At the same time, he has been teaching at various locations around the city – the Bloor JCC, Adath Israel Congregation, Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation and Beth Tzedec Congregation, where the memorial scholarship is given by the Cooper family.

"I enjoy being able to do outreach work and to be able to spend time with people through studying and through text," Rabbi Glazer said.

In his application for the Cooper award, the rabbi wrote of his ambition to some day create a learning centre or society bridging secular and Jewish worlds into one community.

He sees his progression from French student to rabbi as a natural one. The son of a high school French teacher and a dentist, Rabbi Glazer originally studied French in part because he felt it was essential to understanding his identity as a Canadian.

His master's thesis focused on contemporary French Jewish thinker Edmond Jabes. "From there it was a natural step to move into the rabbinate."

Along the way he took elective courses in Hebrew, which he had also studied at United Synagogue Day Schools.

Rabbi Glazer believes that Jews of his generation find spiritual questions much more pressing than halachic ones. "I think Halachah is a way into that spirituality that needs to be unlocked for people," he said.

"There's a need to really address why we're here, how it is that we're here, and what our relationship is with God, and then, through answering those questions, to begin to show that there are many ways of navigating Judaism, and Halachah is one extremely important path."

Recently, the rabbi finished teaching a five-week course called Spiritual Guidance Along the Halachic Path. Each class started with a niggun (wordless melody) and a couple of minutes of silence "as a way of preparing to receive the teaching."

In effect, it's a taste of what Rabbi Glazer has experienced on meditation retreats at Metivta: A Centre for Contemplative Judaism in Los Angeles and what he brought to JTS in an innovative Rosh Chodesh prayer/meditation/mystical text study program.

Although the concept may seem somewhat New Age, the rabbi begs to differ. "I consider it to be very much traditional. It's just a different aspect of tradition that most people aren't aware of," he said.

"A lot of the ancient texts I've been studying now teach this tradition, but unfortunately most of us have never had access to it...Introspection comes from something very deeply ingrained within Jewish mystical tradition."

Canadian Jewish studies group marks 25 years

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Association for Canadian Jewish Studies celebrates an important milestone next month.

At its annual conference, to be held at Laval University in Quebec City from May 24 to 25, it will mark its 25th anniversary.

Originally known as the Canadian Jewish Historical Society, it advances the study of Canadian Jewry in multidisciplinary fields.

Headquartered in Montreal, it is affiliated with the Canadian Jewish Congress.

More academic papers will be delivered at this year's conference than at any other previous one, said its outgoing president Harold (Hesh) Troper, a professor of history and philosophy at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education.

On May 24, the themes under discussion will be Canadian Jews and the Canadian Establishment, Jewish culture in Montreal, the Jewish gay and lesbian experience in Canada, the portrayal of Jewish life in Quebec literature, and the Quebec Jewish experience.

On May 25, the subjects of the day will be the search for Canadian Jewish identity, the direction of Jewish studies in Canada, Jewish Canadian literary figures, and Holocaust survivors and their children.

Troper, co-author of None Is Too Many: Canada and the Jews of Europe, 1933-1948, said that such conferences are beneficial.

"They give people working on Jewish topics feedback and a sense of community."

At the helm of the association for about a year, Troper said he tried to increase membership, especially among graduate students and younger academics.

The association is affiliated with historical societies and archives across the country.

They range from the Ontario Jewish Archives in Toronto and the Jewish Historical Society of Halifax to the Canadian Jewish Congress' archives in Montreal and the Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada in Winnipeg.

The association was founded by a group of mostly "gifted amateurs," Troper said.

"It came out of efforts by lay people rather than by academics. But there was a feeling it should be legitimized by scholars in academia."

In addition to publishing a semi-annual newsletter, Canadian Jewish Studies Bulletin, the association puts out an annual journal, Canadian Jewish Studies.

"The journal is a major achievement, a good, solid periodical very important to Jewish studies," observed Troper.

The current edition, titled Jews and Judaism in Canada, offers readers a major bibliography of scholarly works on Canadian Jews published since 1965. It was compiled by Michael Brown, Richard Menkis, Benjamin Schlesinger and Stuart Schoenfeld.

Menkis, the journal's present editor, is stepping down. A professor of religion and Jewish studies at the University of British Columbia, he will be replaced by Brown, a York University scholar.

Troper himself will be succeeded by Norman Ravvin of Concordia University. The transition will take place at the Laval University conference.

In Troper's estimation, Jewish studies in Canada have yet to come of age. "Compared to the United States, we're at a beginning stage."

Troper, whose last book was The Ransomed of God: The Remarkable Story of One Woman's Role in the Rescue of Syrian Jews (Malcolm Lester Books, 1999), will spend the next three or four years researching and writing his next work.

Having received a grant from the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada, he will write about the impact of the late 1960s on North American Jewry.

"These years were a watershed in North American Jews' self-definition and understanding," he explained. "No one has looked at it very closely."

Troper will focus on the Six Day War, the war in Vietnam, the decay of the Jewish-Afro-American coalition, the election of Pierre Trudeau as Canada's prime minister, and Canada's 1967 centennial.

"All these events, when taken together, truly represent a sea change in the direction of North American Jewry. You touch that era and all kinds of things come out."

QUILT AUCTION:
Faye Sliwan is one of 30 Jewish women who recently joined together to make a quilt that was donated to an auction in support of the Canadian Breast Cancer Society. Quilts donated to this year's campaign will be displayed at the Stratford Armoury in Stratford, Ont., from May 18 until Sept. 2. The exhibit then moves to Casa Loma, where the quilts will be displayed from Sept. 9 until Oct. 30. The auction, which last year raised over $100,000, takes place at the Stratford Festival Theatre on Nov. 10. Sliwan is seen here with her group's quilt titled A Woman's Best Friend. LEONARD FEIN

Writer, teacher and social activist

AGAINST THE DYING OF THE LIGHT: A FATHER'S JOURNEY THROUGH LOSS

Just days after the sudden death of his 30-year-old daughter, Nomi, in 1996, Leonard Fein sat down and began writing. "Back then it was cathartic… I understood from the start that the act of writing was a way to keep her alive and to accept the fact of her death," writes Fein. Fein's new book discusses the death of his daughter and the wisdom derived from his loss. It's also about the human experience, relationships between parents and children, and the support of family members and the larger community.

Thursday, May 17 | 8 p.m.

Holy Blossom Temple | 1950 Bathurst Street, Toronto

The public is cordially invited at no charge

[I have rarely been as moved by a personal memoir as I am by this one. Writing with great simplicity and depth, and not without wisdom, faced with the death of his daughter, Leonard Fein shares with the reader his helplessness and his quasi-mystical urge to overcome it]

MOUNT SINAI HOSPITAL

The Best Medicine

May, 2001

YOUR HOSPITAL, YOUR NEWS

MAKING YOUR WORK SPACE WORK FOR YOU

If you have a sore neck or back, take a look at how your desk or work station is arranged. Susan Chmelnitsky, Occupational Therapist in the Department of Rehabilitation at Mount Sinai Hospital says that there are a lot of things you can do with your home office or workplace to reduce wear and tear on your body.

"Your work space should be set up so that your body is in a neutral posture, forming right angles similar to the letter 'L,'" says Ms. Chmelnitsky.

She also recommends people take "micro" breaks every 20 minutes or so, even if that just means standing up to stretch, rotating your wrists, or turning your head. "The human body was designed for movement and it can't cope with prolonged static postures. Vary your work tasks so that you can change positions from time to time throughout the day."

BODY POSITIONING:

- Keep your neck in a neutral position and avoid twisting or flexing your neck for prolonged periods
- Support your spine (especially the curve of your lower back) with an appropriate backrest or office chair
- Bend elbows to right angles, support forearms with armrests and keep wrists in a neutral position
- Feet should be flat on the floor or supported on a footstool, with hips and knees at right angles (90 degrees)
- Support your feet on the floor or with a footstool
- For other repetitive tasks, bend down using the knees, not the back, and take stretch breaks to reduce pain to muscles and joints

WORK SPACE POSITIONING:

- Organize your desk with frequently-used items in close reach and less-used materials stored out of the way
- Free your work space of clutter and boxes under the desk
- Point your desk lamp to your work, not your face
- Use blinds on windows to reduce glare on the screen
- Adjust the computer monitor height so the top third is at eye level
- Centre the monitor in front of you so your head is not tilted
- Keep the keyboard as flat as possible so wrists are straight
- Keep the mouse within comfortable reach
- Avoid cradling the telephone between your neck and shoulder. Consider using a headset or intercom, or use your non-dominant hand to hold the phone for longer calls
- When typing, use a cookbook holder or copyholder to position paperwork upright within your sightline

Endocrine oncology is not well known or understood. Unlike tumours elsewhere, tumours of the endocrine system can be difficult to identify. Patients often go for years knowing something is wrong.

The Freeman Centre for Endocrine Oncology is now being built thanks to a $1 million donation from Zoltan and Yetta Freeman through the Freeman Family Foundation.

The new centre will provide care and consultation to patients with tumours of the hormone producing (endocrine) system. The project is a collaborative venture between Mount Sinai and St. Michael's Hospital. Mount Sinai will coordinate out-patient and surgical needs, education and research. St. Michael's Hospital will provide in-patient surgery for people with pituitary tumours.

"There is no other centre like this in Canada, and possibly in North America," said Dr. Shereen Ezzat, Program Director. The centre is unique because it bridges two distinct disciplines – oncology (the study of tumours) and endocrinology (the study of endocrine glands and hormones.) The centre will address a gap in the health care system.

These endocrine glands govern the body's hormonal functions. The Freeman Centre will focus specifically on tumours of: the pituitary; the thyroid (in the neck); the parathyroid (also in the neck); and the adrenal glands (on top of the kidneys). Symptoms range from something as common as fatigue to problems with brain function, fertility, and sexual and reproductive functions.

"My vision is for the centre to become a national referral service," said Dr. Harley Smyth, Surgical Director. "We believe the centre brings together both medical and surgical expertise that benefits the patient and provides a home for thoughtful, reflective management of complex problems. The advantage for patients is that they will be working with doctors who are keenly devoted to understanding these disease processes, as opposed to just coming to get fixed," said Dr. Smyth.

"The unique nature of this endeavour is that neither endocrinologist nor surgeon is working alone, so the patient is not going from pillar to post in order to seek the best opinion and the better informed our patients are, the better care they get." said Dr. Smyth.

LEADERSHIP SINAI SPRING BALL A HUGE SUCCESS

Leadership Sinai kicked off a $3.5 million campaign at its third annual Spring Ball to help establish the Leadership Sinai Chair in Surgery and the Leadership Sinai Advanced Surgical Technical Centre (ASTC) at Mount Sinai Hospital.

"We are pleased that so many people joined Leadership Sinai in support of these priority programs at the hospital," said Spring Ball Co-chair, Caryn Markman. "Once again, the Spring Ball was a tremendous success raising over $85,000. The event created quite a buzz! Friends have been talking about how fabulous it was. Everybody had a wonderful time, and looked marvelous."

Leadership Sinai is a group of 170 young corporate and community leaders dedicated to raising funds for important projects at Mount Sinai Hospital. Since 1993, Leadership Sinai has raised $100,000 for the Samuel Lunenfeld Reasearch Institute, $250,000 for additional Labour, Delivery and Recovery Rooms, and funds for the Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre. Most recently, Leadership Sinai fulfilled its $1 million pledge for the Leadership Sinai Centre for Diabetes.

The Spring Ball was held at the Capitol Event Theatre, and was hosted by Canadian television star Carla Collins and was sponsored by Birks, Scotia Bank, Kolter Corp., Larry & Judy Tanenbaum & Family, Bloomberg L.P., Bowne of Canada Ltd., Goodmans LLP and Quebecor Merrill Canada Inc.

"Leadership Sinai would like to thank all of the Spring Ball volunteers and corporate sponsors for their valuable contributions in helping to make this event such a great success," said Co-Chair, Neil Sternthal.

By MARLANE PRESS
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Hate propaganda and human rights issues are being raised by Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region, officials with candidates in the upcoming May 16 provincial election.

CJC officials met separately with Liberal and NDP MLAs and those running for office.

"While much progress has been made in the area of hate and bias crime with the establishment of the Hate Crime Team, more education for law enforcement and community organizations is required to ensure effective reporting of hate crimes," said Zena Simces, chair, CJC, Pacific region.

"We also raised the issue of hate on the Internet and were reassured by the [current NDP] government that we have their support in combating it."

Nisson Goldman, vice-chair, CJC, Pacific region, said he hopes any revisions made to B.C.'s Human Rights Code are made for the benefit of the community and strengthen the legislation.

"From both parties, we've received a lot of answers – some direct, some indirect and some hanging up in the air. It's politics," Goldman said.

"There was reassurance that human rights legislation is viewed as an important tool to ensure a more humane society. [Liberal leader] Gordon Campbell stated the commitment of his party, if elected, to maintain dialogue with NGOs such as Canadian Jewish Congress... and encourage them to bring forward thorough and constructive policy suggestions to the government," Goldman said.

Geoff Plant, Liberal MLA for Richmond-Steveston, said his party has expressed concern with certain sections of the Human Rights Code because they "thought it was too broad and intruded into free speech rights."

For example, Section 7 of the Human Rights Code prohibits "the publication, issue or display of discriminatory material... that is likely to expose [a person or a group or class of persons] to hatred or contempt because of [their] race, colour, ancestry, place of origin, religion, marital status, family status, physical or mental disability, sex, sexual orientation or age."

The provisions have been criticized for going too far and for leaving important decisions on the issue to a quasi-judicial government appointee. They have also been criticized as redundant since the federal Criminal Code also contains provisions to deal with hate propaganda.

The legislation was used to bring former North Shore News columnist Doug Collins before a tribunal, which ruled that he had written anti-Semitic articles.

"We've consistently expressed concerns with Section 7, but I think it's possible to address that concern by amending, without repealing, it," Plant said.

"The B.C. Liberals voted against this section when it was introduced in 1993... That was eight years ago and we've learned a little bit about how the section works and might work. The continuing concern is that it's too broad, but we believe that it is possible to address the concerns without repealing."

NDP MLA Graeme Bowbrick, the attorney general and minister responsible for human rights, dismissed complaints that the Code infringes on free speech.

University of Calgary gets a new president

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Harvey Weingarten has been appointed the new president of the University of Calgary.

The announcement was made in Calgary last month.

Now 48, he will be the university's seventh president, succeeding Terry White.

Currently McMaster University's provost and vice-president of academic affairs, Weingarten starts his new job on Sept. 1.

"I look forward to working with all members of the community, both inside and outside the University of Calgary, to build a truly great university that serves our society and students well," he said in an official statement.

In an interview, Weingarten said the presidency is not the fulfillment of a lifetime ambition.

"To be frank, I did not think about being the president of the University of Calgary until the possibility came up," he said.

Weingarten, a behavioural psychologist with degrees from McGill and Yale, was offered the post early in the year. The university confirmed the appointment in late March.

He was appointed by the university's board of governors after a five-month national search.

Ted Newall, chair of the board, had praised his qualities.

"He brings to the University of Calgary a sound academic background, an outstanding research record and a wealth of experience in university leadership."

Born in Montreal, the son of Lou and Celia Weingarten, he attended the Hebrew Academy before studying at McGill.

A specialist in the biological and psychological controls of eating, he joined McMaster University in 1979, and was named chair of the department of psychology a decade later.

Appointed a full professor in 1990, he became dean of McMaster's faculty of science in 1995, and provost and vice-president in 1996. As provost and vice-president, he was responsible for all academic programs and an academic staff of more than 1,000 teachers in 49 departments.

Weingarten plans to move to Calgary with his wife and two teenage daughters in July.

Coast to Coast

In an interview with The CJN, Tuerr repeated allegations that the Jewish community has special access to Ottawa politicians and meets with them more frequently than other groups. The German-Canadian Congress has met only once with one of Caplan's predecessors and it has been "brushed off" when it tried to set up other meetings, he said. "You don't get an ear."

Tuerr also criticized the federal war crimes unit, saying that "it is so heavily Jewish interest there and no other interests are involved. The Ukrainians, the German ethnics should be there. There should be equal representation in the unit itself."

He also maintained that the German Congress is interested only in "equal justice for all" and that proper legal procedures must be followed. "The German community has nothing against the Jewish community. It's the law... We don't defend Oberlander," he said, adding that Oberlander had not been found guilty of any crime.

Tuerr on several occasions suggested that Oberlander's possible loss of citizenship was reminiscent of the loss of citizenship experienced by thousands of Germans under Soviet rule. And while he acknowledged the Jewish people had suffered a lot, he said it pained him and other Germans that their experiences under the Soviets were not recognized by the broader Canadian community.

CJC's incoming president, Keith Landy, urged the German Congress to tone down its remarks. He also questioned why the organization was coming to the defence of someone like Oberlander.

"I do question the leadership of the German Canadian community for siding with someone who is so clearly on the wrong side of the case, in other words, on the side of evil. Someone who participated in a killing machine, dedicated exclusively to the murder of Jews, should not be seen as an ethnic brother."

Landy rejected Tuerr's suggestion that CJC has special access to politicians. "They have a much larger community and they have the ability to meet with and persuade [politicians] of their point of view," he said.

He also dismissed attempts to turn the case into an ethnic issue.

"It's unfortunate that some leaders of the German Canadian community are trying to turn this into an ethnic conflict. It's not, nor should it be... I urge the government to resist this and to keep their eyes on the ball."

"Oberlander is entitled to judicial process, but there comes a time when you have to say time is important. I don't think a year was needed for her to issue her final report," he said.

In other developments, CJC demanded that Andrew Telegdi, Liberal MP for Kitchener-Waterloo, retract his statement that Canada is like a Nazi regime.

Pro-Israel groups in 'turf war' on the Hill

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

The pro-Israel forces have been pretty active on the Hill of late. In advance of John Manley's first foray into the Middle East as minister of foreign affairs, the Canada-Israel Committee led a delegation to "prep" him for the trip. By all accounts, the meeting went well. Manley is fairly fluent on the issues and has some important and deep relationships with the Jewish community.

More to the point, however, much has been made of his approach to the portfolio, which differs in one critical respect from that which characterized his predecessor, Lloyd Axworthy. Manley is not hostile to the Americans and has even taken some deliberate steps to signal his desire to co-ordinate more closely with his American counterpart, Colin Powell. Of course, as our friends at the CIC observe, the real test will come on the trip itself, which takes the minister to Israel, Jordan, Egypt and the Palestinian territories.

More interesting for the moment is the turf war that is developing between Carolyn Bennett's Canada-Israel Friendship Group and Bill Casey, the Tory foreign affairs critic.

Bennett's group has, for several years, been the central clearing house for Middle East-related initiatives on the Hill. Although clearly supportive of Israel, the group's members have a desire to serve as facilitators of understanding between pro-Israel and pro-Arab groups and to explore ways for Canada to constructively build bridges between the two.

Casey is dedicated to the same cause, but has focused his efforts on building bridges through the Tory caucus. He has been invited to join Manley on the trip and plans to bring Israeli and Palestinian parliamentarians together to advance his concept.

Some of the tension was vented at a luncheon hosted by Bennett and her colleagues for a group of rabbinical leaders who came to Ottawa last week to meet with MPs, senators and officials at Foreign Affairs on the subject of Israel (see next week's column). Apparently, Conservative Senator Con Di Nino used the luncheon to promote the Casey initiative, which incurred Carolyn Bennett's displeasure.

Bennett – and many of her colleagues – feel that the advantage of the Parliamentary Friendship Group rests with its non-partisan nature. Members from all political parties participate and it helps reduce the possibility of Israel being used as a political football. She has a good point! After all, one has only to look back at the last federal election to understand how easily such things can spin out of control.

Casey counters that his initiative has the blessing of both Israeli and Palestinian representatives in Canada and that he is therefore justified in pursuing the project.

It may be that there are other considerations to which an outside observer is not sensitive, but it seems that the Israelis – and the pro-Israel forces here in Canada – should think twice before compromising their support for Bennett's group.

Yom Ha'atzmaut marked in Canada's capital

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — In light of the current situation in Israel, community leaders here felt that a solidarity rally would be more appropriate to celebrate Israel's 53rd independence day than the usual festivities.

The Yom Ha'atzmaut event was held at the Soloway JCC (SJCC) and chaired by Sara Vered. Haim Divon, ambassador of Israel to Canada, expressed the need for such a rally.

"There are so many out there who still do not accept us being there as a Jewish State," Divon said. "All of you are here celebrating with us Israel Independence Day. We are sending a message that we are strong, that we are overcoming our problems, and that in spite of everything, we are able to have a nation that we are all proud of."

"One of the things we can do," he said, "is pray as a community." He noted that the number 53 represents the Hebrew word "even" or stone/rock. This, he said, speaks of our solid commitment to Israel.

Stephen Victor, past chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, urged the community to stand up and be proud of Israel.

In difficult times, he said, it is easy to succumb to despair, but we must not give in to that. Rather, we must "reaffirm that faith, re-kindle that hope and reconnect with the promise of that land."

Dramatic readings by Barry Karp and Jacqueline Stein were interspersed with songs by the Shira Ottawa Choir, directed by Cantor Daniel Benlolo. The students of the Hillel Academy Choir performed several selections as well.

The mood was far from sombre as people mingled, ate Israeli snacks and enjoyed the performance of Ron Eliran, known as "Israel's ambassador of song."

The following day, the traditional flag-raising ceremony was held at the SJCC.

Ambassador Divon also hosted a gala Independence Day celebration at the Westin Hotel for members of the diplomatic corps and other members of both the Jewish and general communities.

David and Debbie Pinsky.

Winnipeg family opens home, heart to Jewish children in need

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — David and Debbie Pinsky first became foster parents when they decided to offer a home to a teenage boy with autism who needed a place to live.

David was working in the school system as an aide for the youngster, and the Pinskys applied through the New Direction program to become his foster parents.

Seven years later, they are still opening their home and their hearts to foster children.

Two years ago, the Pinskys began fostering for the Jewish Child and Family Service. Not only are they among a very few Jewish families and individuals who will take in Jewish foster children, but they welcome the most challenging children.

Over the years, they have provided a home for some 10 youngsters, mainly children who have long-term special needs. They currently have four – a sister and brother, both preschoolers who are developmentally delayed; a 17-year-old who has had family problems; and a 24-year-old woman with autism.

And the Pinskys have persevered despite the fact that their own young daughter, Becky, has a serious health problem, and that David's ailing father lives with them.

Both David and Debbie have the background for caring for foster children with special needs. Debbie has worked in day care, and David is now a teacher who works part time at the Chabad school, although he has also been a wrestler and a stand-up comic.

All foster homes have to be licensed by the province, Debbie Pinsky notes. The Pinskys have two licences. "There is a lot involved – like having to have a special fire escape," Debbie points out. "There are a lot of little things you wouldn't expect."

The key to being a successful foster parent for children with special needs, David says, is to be aware that each one is different. "You have to get to know each one's interests and hobbies."

Debbie adds that social groups for the kids are very important.

Four years ago, the couple were able to establish a social group for autistic teens, through an area high school.

"One of our goals," Debbie says, "is to improve the relationship between our foster children and their parents where we can. It is normal for teens to have conflicts with their parents. The stress is magnified when the child has special needs.

"We have really helped some of our kids get to know their parents at a less intense level while we deal with the difficulties."

Campus group hosts speaker on gay life in Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Hagai El-Ad has often encountered the misconception that gays and lesbians don't exist in Israel, and that, "even if they do, there's no way they can live an open, happy life."

The reality is quite different, although there are "many challenges," said El-Ad, the Haifa-born executive director of the Jerusalem Open House (JOH), a two-year-old centre for the lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgendered community in Jerusalem. A large rainbow flag, a symbol of gay pride, flies outside its offices on Jerusalem's Ben Yehuda Pedestrian Mall.

El-Ad spoke at the University of Toronto's Innis College on a recent Sunday morning at the first JOH event in Canada. His tour also included four American cities.

The three other co-hosts of the event, called Queer in the Holy Land, were the National Union of Jewish LGBT Students (www.nujls.org); the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism; and JLGBT (the Jewish Lesbian Gay Bisexual Transgendered Students and Young Professional of Toronto – a subgroup of Jewish Campus Services [JCS] of Greater Toronto's Graduates and Young Professionals [GAP]).

The program included a screening of Gay Games, a film about Israel's participation in the 1998 Olympic-style event two years ago, and a reading by Jacob Press, co-author of Independence Park, a book about gay men in Israel.

El-Ad, a 31-year-old working on a Harvard University PhD in Astrophysics, wants to expose another side of Israel that is "more gay-friendly, more tolerant and more inclusive."

In fact, the "lesbigay" centre, on its letterhead, bills itself as advancing the cause of social tolerance.

The message sounds more like Tel Aviv ("Israel's gay mecca") than Jerusalem, as El-Ad is quick to admit.

"In Jerusalem we do not celebrate diversity," he said. The three major sectors of the city's population – Orthodox Jews, secular Jews and Palestinians – rarely mix, he noted. "And that's considered a good thing. This way we'll have the least amount of friction."

While the JOH serves all three sectors (about 1,000 people a month), part of El-Ad's hope for Jewish gays is that the JOH (www.gay.org.il/joh) and organizations like the JCS offshoot here will make it possible for young Jewish gays or lesbians to find a way to connect with their heritage and with Israel, he told an audience of about 20 people.

Hagai El-Ad

"For many people, being gay is a factor that distances them from Israel and their Jewish identity," he said.

El-Ad outlined the legal milestones in Israel that have made life easier for the gay community there, beginning with the elimination of sodomy as a criminal offence in 1988.

In 1992, he noted, employment rights for gays and lesbians were protected for the first time in Israel. The following year saw a change in IDF regulations regarding recruitment and promotion of gay and lesbian soldiers "as their peers without any discrimination," and gay and lesbian couples also have civil partnership rights, he added.

Interestingly, because heterosexual couples in Israel can marry only under religious law, there is broad recognition in Israeli law of common-law marriage, initially created for "straight couples that didn't want to marry or couldn't marry" under religious law.

While life for gays is better than it was, the Jerusalem centre has had occasional threats, said El-Ad, who works with two part-time staffers and a crew of some three dozen volunteers, but "nothing as extreme as people have feared." Whether that's a sign of tolerance or a lack of perception of the Open House as a threat, he's not sure.

The centre – which has been an exhibitor alongside more mainstream organizations at exhibitions for Birthright trips – operates on a budget of $250,000 U.S. It receives about 10 percent of its funding from the New Israel Fund, its first and at the time primary funder. The rest comes from other foundations and individual donors.

Younger students (age 15 to 18) have their own group at the Open House, which offers, among a wide range of services, support groups for Haredi gays (one in English, one in Hebrew), a PFLAG (Parents and Friends of Lesbians and Gays) group, and activities such as folk dancing and soccer.

Groups are run by volunteer counsellors who meet with a professional therapist every two weeks for guidance. Teens particularly are "desperate for some safe space," El-Ad said in a phone interview following his Toronto appearance. In Jerusalem, gay teens think they're the only ones in their situation, and are afraid to tell their parents and their peers, he added.

Another big issue for Israeli gay teens is how to deal with the IDF recruitment process, said El-Ad, who began to come out of the closet himself in his final year of service.

"Being a gay soldier is a very different experience than it was ten years ago," he said. "Not to say everything is perfect – it depends who you serve with and what you're doing."

Although El-Ad spent three years in the United States on a pre-doctoral fellowship, he served as chair of the Other 10 percent, the gay and lesbian student union at Hebrew University in 1997. The organization, now 10 years old, had many overseas students among its founders, he noted.

With the exception of Bar-Ilan University – which has a religious orientation but a mix of observant and secular students – most other campuses in Israel also have groups for gay students, he said.

Prof explores relationships between older people

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — There are more Jews in the world over the age of 65 than in any other ethnic group, Prof. Rachel Schlesinger of York University said recently.

Furthermore, the trend is for younger women to marry older men, Schlesinger said in presenting the 11th annual Frances Bitterman Memorial Lecture at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, in which she spoke about relationships and interaction between people of a certain age.

Describing the above as an "interesting trend," Schlesinger gave two examples of new relationships involving women marrying older men.

In one case, a librarian of 68 married a man of 75 who did not propose until he had studied Judaism for a year to put himself at her level. "They had happy lives for 22 years together," she said.

In the second case, a woman of 63 married a man of 83 who would not go ahead with the wedding until he told her his correct age. She had thought he was younger. They spent 10 years together.

Often, "there is a long-lasting relationship when one of the couple is older than 60," she said.

There are many myths, including "dreadful jokes" about aging, which need to be exposed, Schlesinger said, blaming the business world for creating myths that older women and men need hair dye and other beauty aids.

Looking at their relationships, most Jewish widows she interviewed in Palm Springs and Los Angeles told her they did not want to marry again. "They did not want the baggage that went with marriage and they were afraid of being widowed again. And guilt was a big issue with them, feeling they were unfaithful to their first marriage."

One of the interesting things that came out was that women wanted some legal protection if they did go ahead with another marriage, she said.

"Women who attract men are more active and more involved," Schlesinger said, adding that everyone should become involved in community affairs.

On the basis of her own research into relationships, she praised Israel for the services it has provided for the aged, including Arabs who live in the Jewish State. "We talk about the horrific things that go on from day to day, but we must not forget the wonderful things happening there."

In speaking to older people, students at York University first found conversations with Canadian-born Jews boring because there were no "fantastic escapes," such as they heard about from Holocaust survivors, but "they learned how tough it was to be the only Jewish family in a small town, and in the end they enjoyed talking to them," Schlesinger said.

Although many of her students wanted to "grow old," very few wanted "to be old," she said. "A little girl will say proudly that she is 2½, but how often do you hear a woman or man say "I'm 63½."

Young people today don't respect the wisdom of older people because they don't know how to run computers, but it is the older people who carry memories in their heads of what it was like before everyone wrote things down.

Jewish women continue to absorb "kitchen wisdom," as she did while her grandmother baked.

Schlesinger said she preferred the word "citizen" to senior, noting that the Hebrew language doesn't have many words for aging, and she would like newspapers to publish "life notices" rather than "death notices." She doesn't like the word "volunteer," either, saying "chesed" in Hebrew is a better word.

Harvey Bitterman spoke of his mother, for whom the lecture is named. She considered Beth Tikvah Synagogue a valuable part of her life, he said. His father, Morris Bitterman, said he was one of the "citizens" to whom Schlesinger referred.

Jewish Distress Line helps depressed callers

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Even those who plan to kill themselves do not use the word suicide, says Bonnie Kates, chair of the board of Tel-Aide, the Jewish Distress Line.

What they say is that "they want to end it all."

Shortly before Suicide Prevention Week – this year, May 13 to May 20 – Kates told The CJN how the 16-year-old volunteer-run-and-organized program deals with what may be a suicide call.

The person who takes the call, Kates said, coaxes callers to say why they feel the way they do, gets them to talk about themselves, and discusses tactics such as improving their coping skills and tapping into support systems.

"They are, in some way, psychologically compromised," she said, either medically, like having schizophrenia or bipolar disorder, being clinically depressed or having a history of previous attempts; or they might be facing a life crisis like job loss, marital breakdown, or a death in the family.

They may be depressed, isolated, lonely or in dire financial straits, Kates explained.

As well, with government cuts to health-care service, Kates said, people may have long waits between visits to health-care professionals.

Tel-Aide also deals with families and friends who have had to deal with suicide.

"A regular death is a private affair. Family and friends rally round, and you know what will happen," Kates said.

On the other hand, suicide is public. "Ninety-five percent of suicides are found at home by a family member. He or she calls 911 or runs out in the street screaming. The police, the forensic investigaters, the coroner come. The yellow tape goes up."

Reporters arrive, drawn by messages on the police bands, and go around to the neighbours to find out about the family and the person who has committed suicide, she said.

Even the time frame of funeral and mourning rituals are different, as there has to be an autopsy, which in itself is a considerable stress.

"People don't think about that part of it," Kates said.

What she finds especially frightening, she said, is the teenage callers, and there are a lot of them. "They often call with a well thought out plan," she said.

They have given away their prized possessions and have written notes to their parents. "They have made their choice."

Why do teenagers, supposedly with their whole lives ahead of them, feel that suicide is their only option? For some, it is the usual teenage angst – they feel that they are ugly, fat, pimply, their mother doesn't understand, their teachers are hassling them.

Some are devastated by their parents' divorce. "Even though they know that their parents are having problems and that divorce is being contemplated, they are still devastated when it actually becomes true."

The volunteers make a contract with people who call in. "Don't do anything until you call back. Don't do anything until you call the doctor."

They may make suggestions – go for a walk, or go to buy a paper. "That's not only for suicidal people," Kates said. "That's for anyone who is depressed."

The volunteers, who range in age from 22 to some in their 80s, have a stiff, six-week training course, where they role play, and learn about what resources there are in both the Jewish and the general communities.

"Not everyone completes the course," Kates noted.

They must make a commitment, preferably for three hours a week, although that can be flexible.

There are more women than men volunteers, Kates said, which reflects the callers too. "Maybe women are more open, more conditioned to talk."

There are only 50 volunteers, Kates said, and Tel-Aide can use more. There is no paid staff ("we would love to have someone volunteer to fund-raise!") and the organization relies solely on private donations. "I do a lot of speaking," Kates laughed.

Plans are being made to set up booths at various malls during Suicide Prevention Week, and at book fairs – anywhere they can get people's attention.

Dental Alliance in Toronto aids Israeli hospital

TORONTO — Sarah Herzog Memorial Hospital, a geriatric/psychiatric facility in Jerusalem, and the Dental Alliance in Toronto have joined forces to raise funds for the hospital's dental clinic.

The clinic services the elderly of the greater Jerusalem area, and its institutionalized psychiatric patients living at the hospital and in their outpatient facility. It also services members of the community including children and the poor through its outreach projects.

Dental Alliance Inc. a new Internet company co-founded by Leon Treger, a dentist, and Ron Mandel, a marketing specialist, both in Thornhill, has announced that it will donate three percent of any dental supply products purchased from their company to Herzog Hospital.

Mandel believes that dentists will be pleased at this opportunity to support this great clinic at Herzog Hospital.

Jan Babins, the director of the Canadian Friends of Herzog Hospital, says she hopes Jewish dentists will become involved in this program.

"We at Herzog Hospital are looking forward to a long and mutual rewarding association with the Dental Alliance Inc.," Babins said.

L'Chaim offers compelling advantages for seniors

As L'Chaim Retirement Home rapidly takes shape at 718 Sheppard Avenue West, excitement is growing in the community over the prospect of this new and wonderfully different alternative in retirement living.

Giving real credence to the phrase "you're not getting older, you're getting better," L'Chaim intends to make the transition from a resident's own home to retirement home as smooth as possible. Maintaining and enhancing quality of life is paramount, says founder Judy Cohen, and the community's enthusiastic response to date indicates that the time is indeed ripe for the l'Chaim concept: big enough to offer all the bells and whistles, state-of-the-art safety features and services, yet small enough to devote thorough care and attention to the individual. Says Judy, "the act of moving into new physical surroundings is nothing compared to the angst that leaving one's family can cause. We're not just a building to move into, but a new family to join. When we say we care, we really mean it; it's not just an advertising slogan. We will take a personal interest in each and every resident. We will respect their privacy, but we'll also want to know what's going on with them and give them every opportunity to integrate themselves into our little 'community' ".

To this end, Judy has taken great care to bring on board associates who can relate to residents on a personal level as well as professional. Among others, the staff of L'Chaim will include Lorraine Sherkin, well-known for her 30 years of devoted service at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, and Dr. Suzanna Gross, a family physician with an affinity for the elderly.

Enhancing the communal feeling will be a host of activities, Jewish cuisine served three times daily in the dining room, and a welcoming environment that will duplicate, as closely as possible, the family setting. There will also be a huge party room for seders and simchas of all kinds. "We want the aspect of 'retirement home' to be transparent," says Judy. "In other words, we don't want want the grandchildren to say, 'let's go to the retirement home to see Zaydie,' we want them to say, 'Let's go see Zaydie!' "

Unit rentals moving briskly

With construction proceeding rapidly and opening slated for mid-summer, reservations have been brisk — so much so, according to Judy, that people for whom logistical preferences are important (floor number, direction of exposure, etc.) are advised to move quickly before the preferred units are snapped up. She's extremely gratified that the community has taken to the concept so readily. "I was always confident in our approach," she says, "but until you move from the drawing board to the live stage, you never know how people will respond." So impressed have some early customers been, in fact, that they've joked about retiring early themselves to take advantage of the facilities. "One customer said, "Never mind YOU, Ma — I'm moving in," chuckles Judy.

Small in size but not in features, L'Chaim boasts a number of unusual amenities and services, like an exercise and physio room and an onsite hairdresser. Add to all its other advantages its ultraconvenient location on Sheppard just west of Bathurst, and L'Chaim becomes a compelling new-home alternative for independent-minded seniors.

L'Chaim is a member of the Ontario Residential Care Association, and plans to open this summer. For further information, call Judy Cohen at 416-398-7898. You can also e-mail her at info@lchaimretirement.com.

Israel cautious on Mitchell Commission report

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israeli officials are giving a mixed response to the findings of a U.S.-led commission probing the causes of Israeli-Palestinian violence that erupted last September and continues unabated seven months later.

The officials said they are pleased the Mitchell Commission found that Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's visit to the Temple Mount last September did not cause the violence that erupted soon after, as the Palestinians originally claimed.

Some Palestinian officials later admitted that the violence had been planned for months – a claim the commission rejected.

The commission also recommended against deploying international observers in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, as the Palestinians had sought.

But Israel is dismayed that the report links Jewish settlements in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip to the ongoing violence.

The report called for a halt to all Jewish settlement activity, including the "natural growth" of existing settlements.

At the same time, the report said the Palestinian leadership should crack down on terrorism if peace talks are to resume.

Sharon rejected the call for a settlement freeze. He said the recommendation by the Mitchell Commission flies in the face of previously signed Israeli-Palestinian accords, which do not state that Israel should freeze all settlement construction.

Israel has agreed not to build new settlements, but reserves the right to expand existing settlements to handle "natural population growth."

Zalman Shoval, a Sharon adviser and former ambassador to the United States, told Israel Radio on Sunday that the committee made a "big mistake" in linking the settlement issue to the outbreak of violence.

For the Palestinians, the link was political gold. Yasser Abed Rabbo, the Palestinian Authority minister of information, told a news conference Sunday that while the Mitchell Commission findings are not complete, they could provide a way to halt the current violence.

The commission was conceived as part of a peace package, at a summit in Sharm el-Sheik, Egypt, last October. In the end, it was the only element of the package – whose main element was an immediate ceasefire – that was implemented.

Among the report's other recommendations:

- The Palestinian Authority should prevent Palestinian gunmen from firing on or from populated areas, and establish a clear chain of command for all armed personnel operating in areas under its control;
- Israel should lift closures on Palestinian areas, permit Palestinian workers to return to their jobs in Israel and transfer to the Palestinian Authority all tax revenues owed; and
- Israel should ensure that its security forces avoid destroying homes, roads and trees in Palestinian areas.

The report was presented to Israeli and Palestinian officials last Friday. A final report will be published after the two sides have a chance to respond.

Panel members include former U.S. senator George Mitchell, who served as chair; Turkish President Suleyman Demirel; Thorbjoern Jagland, Norway's minister of foreign affairs; and Javier Solana, the European Union's top diplomat.

The issue of Jewish settlements is also emerging as a stumbling block to an Egyptian-Jordanian initiative aimed at stopping the violence and restarting peace talks. The initiative, drafted with the help of Palestinian officials, calls for an end to all settlement activity.

Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres visited Egypt, Jordan and the United States in recent weeks to offer Israeli input on the plan.

Egyptian Foreign Minister Amre Moussa, however, was quoted Sunday as saying that no changes could be made to the proposal.

Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat over the weekend called for an international summit in Sharm el-Sheik to discuss the Mitchell Commission's conclusions.

Israel rejected the idea. Sources in Jerusalem were quoted as saying that Arafat made the suggestion in an effort to get an invitation to the White House and forge closer ties with Washington.

Meanwhile, violence in the region showed no signs of abating.

Israeli Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer said Sunday that he has given the army permission to enter Palestinian-controlled areas whenever the army feels it is necessary for Israeli security.

Ben-Eliezer made the announcement after Israeli forces briefly entered the Arab town of Beit Jalla on the southern outskirts of Jerusalem. The incursion came after Palestinian gunmen fired at cars on a road linking Jerusalem to Jewish settlements in the West Bank.

In other violence Sunday, five Israelis were hospitalized – one with light wounds and four for shock – after a bomb exploded in a trash can in the city of Petach Tikvah on Sunday morning. The blast was the third to rock the Tel Aviv suburb in recent weeks.

In the Gaza Strip, Palestinians fired four mortar shells at the nearby Israeli town of Sderot and at the settlement of Netzarim, but the attacks caused no injuries.

Iran focus of Israel's concern

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Foreign Minister Shimon Peres are asking Dutch Foreign Minister Jozias van Aartsen to thwart the approval of a loan to Iran.

The Netherlands is Israel's representative on the World Bank's board of directors, which will vote next week on a proposed $755-million loan to the Iranian government for a series of infrastructure and economic rehabilitation programs.

"The dispute is political, not financial," a political source in Jerusalem said. "The Iranians don't need the money, but rather the legitimization that comes with a loan from an institute such as the World Bank."

During his visit to Washington last week, Peres spoke of Israel's concerns that Iran would develop nuclear weapons and that it would turn into a world centre for terrorism.

Peres also warned of the continuing flow of nuclear technology from Russia to Iran, saying that Russia had secretly agreed to help the Iranians in exchange for the Ayatollah's assistance in the war against Muslim Chechenya.

Peres asked his American hosts to work against the loan's approval. World Bank President James D. Wolfensohn explained that the decision is up to the board of directors and not him personally, but assured Peres that even if the loan is approved, it can always be appealed.

Meanwhile, National Security Adviser Uzi Dayan met with U.S. National Security Adviser Condoleezza Rice and Pentagon and State Department officials and told them that Israel intended to fight against the loan.

Last year, the World Bank approved a loan of $232 million to Iran to improve health services and sewerage and to advance President Mohammad Khatami's reforms. The loan passed, despite U.S. opposition.

This time, the vote will have much more of an impact on Iranian politics – Iran goes to the polls on June 8, and President Khatami is looking for re-election.

French Jews enraged by coddling of Hezbollah

By JOSHUA SCHUSTER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — A series of sharp verbal exchanges between French and Israeli diplomats has prompted Jewish leaders here to criticize the French government.

The most recent cause for alarm in bilateral relations that seem to be deteriorating quickly came during French Foreign Minister Hubert Vedrine's weekend visit to Lebanon and Syria, where he pointedly criticized the Israeli government.

On several occasions, Vedrine took the opportunity to denounce the "aggressive politics" of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

At the same time, Vedrine appeared to support Hezbollah as a legitimate resistance movement.

Hezbollah has continued attacking Israel even after the Israeli withdrawal from southern Lebanon last May, citing the continued occupation of Shabaa Farms, a part of the Golan Heights that Israel conquered from Syria in 1967.

Vedrine supported Hezbollah's demand that Israel withdraw from Shabaa Farms – despite repeated statements by UN officials that the land is not Lebanese and that Israel's withdrawal from Lebanon is complete.

French Jewish leaders condemned Vedrine's statements.

"We cannot accept that France would recognize Hezbollah as a resistance movement," said Chaim Musicant, executive director of CRIF, the umbrella group of secular French Jewish organizations.

"Hezbollah is a movement against the Israeli people. It is not a resistance movement."

Although its official policy is to remain nonpartisan in Middle East affairs, France has a generally pro-Arab tilt due to its large Islamic population and its long-standing friendship with several Arab countries.

Last October, for example, at the end of a Paris summit meeting designed to put an end to the then-young intifadah, Israel charged that French President Jacques Chirac essentially convinced Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat to walk away from a cease-fire agreement reached after arduous negotiations and to hold out instead for a better deal. Half a year later, the violence continues.

Some observers contend that France's pro-Arab position has less to do with ideological commitment to the Arab cause than a desire to win friends – and, more importantly, business – in the Arab world.

Vedrine's comments over the weekend dovetailed with a growing stream of anti-Israel stances from the French government.

In recent weeks, a coalition of E.U. countries led by France has been pushing the European Union to suspend Israel's privileged trade status with Europe, which is worth millions of dollars to the Jewish State.

Such a proposition is unlikely to pass, but the European Union may suspend the favoured trade status offered to Israeli goods produced in Jewish settlements in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

French Jewish leaders bridle at their government's anti-Israel statements, but they are even angrier that France does not speak out against Palestinian terror attacks against Israeli targets.

"Europe has never understood that it needs to remain neutral in its policy toward the Middle East," Musicant said. "If France does not play an active role in condemning Palestinian acts of terrorism, it cannot have a positive role" in the peace process.

Musicant added that France should balance its criticisms of Israel by closely monitoring the aid the European Union gives to the PA. Critics long have charged that much of the E.U. aid is siphoned off by Arafat's cronies.

Symptomatic of the French Jewish community's frustration with the current administration, a recent scuffle arose when Israel's ambassador to France, Eli Barnavi, was quoted in the bimonthly Jewish newspaper La Tribune Juive as saying that France had disappointed him and was showing bias and a "terrible lack of judgment."

French wire services quickly picked up the remark, which prompted the ambassador's office to issue a statement denying the comments.

A review of the interviewer's tapes revealed that Barnavi indeed had been misquoted. The damage already had been done, however, as French officials already had been pressed to respond to the incident.

But the editor of La Tribune Juive later insisted the overall sense of the interview was correct.

"We maintain that we did our work properly," editor Olivier Guland said. "Basically, Ambassador Barnavi said in plain words what every Israeli is thinking about the openly pro-Arab position of the French Ministry of Foreign Affairs."

Bush vows to pressure PA to end violence

By NITZAN HOROWITZ and ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — U.S. President George W. Bush affirmed last Friday in private assurances to Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and in public statements that his government will exert pressure for an end to violence and terrorism.

After his meeting with Peres, Bush said the foreign minister "is leaving the White House knowing this administration is making an active effort... to break the cycle of violence that grips the region."

Bush's statements satisfied Israeli officials with Peres as they stressed the aim of the trip was to lobby for continuing American pressure on Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat. Bush did not need persuading, the officials said. Of his own accord he stated adamantly that terrorism poses one of the gravest threats to Middle Eastern and world stability.

Bush asked Peres if the Palestinian Authority had re-incarcerated terrorists who were released from jail in the past. Peres said the PA had yet to do so. Its refusal, Peres said, is a stumbling block that impedes Israel's ability to make conciliatory measures Arafat and other PA leaders would like.

Peres said Arafat bears responsibility for the terrorist attacks on Israel. In some past instances however, he acknowledged, Arafat's subordinates had been involved in terrorist acts without the PA Chairman's knowledge.

During his White House discussions, Peres outlined Israel's reservations on the recent Jordan-Egypt initiative. He told President Bush that Israel wants a direct dialogue with the Palestinians, a discussion in which the Americans play a supporting role while not acting as an active negotiation party.

The White House conversation also broached the contentious issue of Jerusalem. Peres stressed that the holy city belongs to all religions, and that it would be wrong to give one faith, Islam, a monopoly over the others. Bush concurred. Peres added that conditions might not be ripe at this time for a decision regarding Jerusalem's fate.

U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell, who also took part in the White House meeting, said security talks involving Israel and the PA have made some progress.

Back in Israel, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon issued a statement that appeared to contradict the remarks attributed to Peres suggesting Arafat has not known about terrorist attacks on Israelis.

"There is no doubt," Sharon said, "the attacks today result from a strategic decision of Arafat. Organizations subordinate to Arafat, including Fatah, and other organizations such as Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Hezbollah, know that they have a green light to continue with attacks against Israel."

Peres denied suggesting Arafat isn't responsible for attacks against Israel. Under the Oslo accords, Peres recalled, Arafat bears responsibility for anti-Israeli terrorism. Yet Peres reiterated his belief that in some cases Arafat had no prior knowledge of terror attacks. The foreign minister lashed out at politicians and critics who attacked earlier statements which were attributed to him, saying such criticism "created a scandal out of nonsense."

Victim's father was murdered by terrorists in January

By AMNON BARZILAI and NADAV SHRAGAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Three months after his father Aryeh Hershkowitz was murdered in a Palestinian ambush, Asaf Hershkowitz, 31, a resident of the settlement of Ofra, was killed last week in a hail of bullets fired by Palestinian guerrillas near Beit El.

Hershkowitz was on his way out of Ofra early in the morning, when his car was sprayed with 27 bullets. He lost control of the car, which overturned at the side of the road.

Hershkowitz was wearing a bullet-proof vest at the time of the attack, but he was hit in the neck and was killed.

The Islamist group Hamas claimed responsibility for the killing. It said it was revenge for the Palestinians who died in two bomb explosions earlier in the week on Monday night, one in Gaza and one in Ramallah.

About 200 metres from the site of last week's shooting, Kach leader Benjamin Kahane and his wife Talia were killed on Dec. 31, 2000, when their vehicle came under fire. Three of their children were injured in the attack.

Preliminary investigation of last week's incident shows that the gunmen fled to the nearby village of Bitin, where a car waited for them and drove them away. Security services believe that in the village, the gunmen switched to another vehicle, which then drove them to Ramallah.

Initial assessments indicate that the gunmen were affiliated with Force 17. In response to the murder, the IDF imposed a closure on the nearby Palestinian town of Ramallah and other Palestinian villages.

While Prime Minister Ariel Sharon attributed responsibility for the surge of violence in the territories to Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat, the Yesha Council of Jewish settlements called on Sharon to end his policy of restraint.

"The Sharon government must immediately initiate a crushing strike against the headquarters of the Palestinian Authority," the council said.

"One cannot blame Arafat for terrorism and at the same time exempt him from the appropriate punishment. In addition to the military response, we must also give a fitting Zionist response and strengthen the Jewish presence in Yesha [the West Bank and Gaza]."

The IDF decided not to begin its promised gradual lifting of closure and sieges on Palestinian towns in the territories, in response to what is viewed as a further deterioration in the security situation.

However, the IDF announced that there was no connection between the Hershkowitz murder and its decision not to begin easing the sanctions.

Also last week, the IDF revealed that it had carried out a four-month operation, with the support of the Shin Bet, in an effort to capture a group of Tanzim paramilitaries that had carried out a number of attacks against Israelis in the areas northwest of Ramallah since the outbreak of the intifadah.

The joint operation began with a failed attempt to capture Mahmud Abd al-Kader Sheikh, 31, who is a senior member of the Palestinian General Intelligence organization. He is currently hiding out in Ramallah.

In the past two months, three members of the group were arrested, including Osama Awda, 25, a policeman in the Palestinian Authority, and they admitted to carrying out a number of attacks against Israeli settlers.

April 30

• Israel's ambassador to Cairo lashed out at the Egyptian press after a newspaper depicted Shimon Peres as a Nazi. "The depiction of Peres in this way represents incitement and hatred, which has no place in Egypt and the Middle East," Zvi Mazel said after he lodged an official complaint.

May 1

• Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said he refuses to agree to a settlement freeze, adding, "We will not pay protection money for stopping terror."

May 2

May 3

• Israel Aircraft Industries (IAI) sold its Galaxy Aerospace Corporation subsidiary, which produces executive jets, to General Dynamics for $330 million (US). Under the deal, the largest in IAI history, the U.S. company will pay an additional $315 million over the next six years.

May 4

• Media reported that Israeli security forces earlier in the week had arrested two members of Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat's Force 17 guard. The two were suspected of involvement in terrorist attacks.

Files from JTA

The Palestinian media prism

Arafat and his people know the war with Israel will not be won with guns and terror. This is a political war, and the most important battlefield is that of international public opinion. — Danny Rubinstein, Ha'aretz, March 23

Ehud Ya'ari, in his Jerusalem Report column, "Palestinian 'Hasbarah'" (May 7), underscores Rubinstein's observation with the claim that "the Palestinians have effectively taken control of the reporting on the intifadah and events in the territories." By his own estimate, "over 95 percent of the TV pictures going out via satellite every evening to various foreign and Israeli channels are supplied by Palestinian film crews" who either identify with the Palestinian cause or are fearful of reporting anything that could "embarrass" the Palestinian Authority.

According to Reports

In its recent annual report, the Committee to Protect Journalists, which monitors freedom of the press around the world, noted that Palestinian journalists are subjected to "verbal abuse, threats, and questions about their published work. Such heavy-handed treatment fosters self-censorship throughout the Palestinian media. All the major dailies enjoy cozy relations with the PNA [Palestinian National Authority]... and the mainstream [foreign] press routinely avoids coverage of sensitive issues such as PNA corruption and mismanagement, human rights abuses by security forces or any reporting that might cast Arafat in a negative light."

Local Palestinian TV and radio stations have been shut down, their staff intimidated and in some cases detained and beaten. In March, Arafat even temporarily closed the Ramallah bureau of Al-Jazeera, the Qatar-based satellite news channel (unique in the Arab world for broadcasting uncensored news) after it showed images of Arafat that he considered unflattering.

Yet not all Palestinian journalists have been cowed. Some have attempted to report accurately in defiance of Palestinian threats. For instance, on April 19, when the PA at first claimed to the international media that an Israeli rocket had demolished part of a building occupied by Force17, Arafat's elite guard, it was a Palestinian journalist reporting for Associated Press who revealed that there had been no Israeli involvement in the incident. Rather, the blast was thought to be a "work-related" accident suffered by Force 17 in preparation of a bomb. This courageous journalist also reported that film from foreign news crews at the scene had been confiscated by PA police.

Israeli journalists have also been intimidated by the PA. On April 19, Israeli media reported that Marwan Barghouti, head of the Tanzim militia, threatened death to any Israeli journalist who enters the territories. Today, almost all Israeli journalists are staying away.

It is against this background of intimidation and tight control that many news reports of events in the territories are being filtered. All the more reason to admire those reporters who continue to try to get the full story out. Israel's open society where journalists are free to report critically puts it at a distinct disadvantage in this ongoing battle for public opinion.

Jewish Agency looks west for immigrants

By YAIR SHELEG
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Jewish Agency has set a new strategic goal to increase immigration from Western countries which have long been considered unpromising sources of future Israelis, says agency chair Salai Meridor.

In the last 12 years, more than a million immigrants have come to Israel, including 900,000 from the former Soviet Union and 40,000 from Ethiopia, but Meridor says, these "reservoirs" are emptying.

"There are clear signs of a drop in immigration from the former Soviet Union, except for a brief jump in 1999-2000 because of domestic difficulties in Russia," Meridor says.

"According to our projection, this year we'll consider it good if we get 40,000 immigrants from the Commonwealth of Independent States, and toward the end of this decade we'll only see about 20,000. In Ethiopia, the Falash Mura immigration will soon be over and that will end the immigration effort from there."

In Meridor's view, Israel's own demographics must be considered.

"To preserve at least an 80 percent Jewish majority in the future, we need at least 40,000 immigrants a year in the coming years. On the assumption that the sources of Russia and Ethiopia are drying up, there's a need to find other sources of Jewish immigration elsewhere."

In the best Zionist tradition, the first targets are places where Jews live in various degrees of distress. Meridor cites three possible locations: Argentina (and, indeed, the entire Latin American Jewish community), which is in an economic crisis and is home to 200,000 Jews; South Africa, where 80,000 Jews have been living in a fractious post-apartheid society and dealing with economic difficulties and rising crime; and France, which has half a million Jews and is the third largest Jewish community after the United States and Israel.

The Jewish Agency believes a rise in anti-Semitic incidents in France since the intifadah started could spur emigration from there. Some at the agency even believe that the rising strength of the French Muslim community could add to Jewish insecurity there.

'We've stepped up involvement in the Jewish schools we help finance'

The agency has already started activities to encourage immigration from these three countries.

"We've greatly increased our activities in Argentina along with the government, increasing our investment to some $10 million," Meridor says.

"We've stepped up involvement in the Jewish schools we help finance, and sent out emissaries to neighbourhoods with large concentrations of Jews. We assume there are Jews embarrassed to ask for our help, and we have to reach them."

In South Africa, the problem is more difficult, because while many Jews have been leaving, their preference is for Australia and New Zealand, because of the language, the climate and general economic conditions.

Nonetheless, both Argentina and South Africa have already seen the introduction of the Jewish Agency's Na'aleh program, in which youth precede their parents in making aliyah to Israel. In France, however, the large Jewish community is by no means in distress, as one of the leaders of the community, Haim Muzikent, points out.

"It's true we had problems last October, but all the signs point to isolated incidents and no national-level anti-Semitism," Muzikent said.

"The incidents were condemned right across the political spectrum, so France cannot be seen as an anti-Semitic state."

Yet the community will be happy to co-operate with Jewish Agency efforts, he says, "not from distress, but because we believe immigration to Israel is very important for preserving Jewish identity."

Meridor, for his part, is not content with targeting just these three countries. He wants an immigration campaign across the West – in the United States, Canada, Western Europe and Australia.

"We have to bring back the Zionist dialogue, immigration in particular," he says. "Immigration can be seen as a Jewish value, common to all the religious movements. Immigration and absorption should resume their rightful place in the domestic Israeli dialogue, so that immigrants who do arrive feel wanted, and not be looked on as suckers."

As for getting the message across in Western communities that have never been asked to pack up and leave for Israel, Meridor says, "We don't have the luxury to forego the effort. There is a lot of openness in the religious leadership of all the movements to recognize immigration to Israel. It is difficult to contradict the argument that those who want Jewish continuity can promise it better there than in Israel."

Communities must be told that if Israel is critical for the Diaspora, and if Israel's demography is critical for Israel, then immigration is critical, he says.

Assad rules out military strike on Israel

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Syria does not intend to launch a military strike against Israel in retaliation for the bombing of a Syrian radar station near Beirut last month, President Bashar Assad told the Spanish daily El Pais in a rare interview published last week.

Spain is preparing to receive the young president on his first state visit to a European country.

"Surely I cannot disclose the method of response," Assad said. "There are various military, political and other options for a retaliation. But to retaliate militarily would grant [Prime Minister Ariel] Sharon's wish to push the area into war at a time of his choosing. The important thing is that our response, whose nature would be decided at the appropriate time, should be carried out in accordance with our own way and [be] the type that achieves our objectives."

The 35-year-old president succeeded his late father Hafez Assad as president last July. He said Syria is not interested in war and Israel would not dare undertake such an adventure.

Asked about the likelihood of regional war, Assad said: "That depends on both sides – Syria and Israel. Syria doesn't seek to ignite a war, but do the signs suggest that Israel also doesn't want a war? Indications suggest the contrary… but if war is imposed, Syria will defend itself and is capable of doing that."

On the matter of a Middle East peace, Assad said that any peace must be all-encompassing, one that includes the Palestinians, the Syrians and the Lebanese. Any separate agreement would merely be "a peace agreement, but not a peace." He said if Syria's conditions are met – a full withdrawal from the Golan Heights and territory on the shores of Lake Kinneret, Syria will be prepared to make peace with Israel.

Asked about the chances of renewing peace talks under the leadership of Ariel Sharon, Assad responded: "We do not look at the personalities. We have a right, which must be returned to us, and there are UN Security Council resolutions that must be implemented. What goes on in Israel is of no interest to me, and we only take into account signals [from Israel]."

He told El Pais Sharon's landslide election victory in February could only mean that support for peace among Israelis is weak and limited. "How could a people who want peace elect a man known to be a war criminal," he asked?

Assad denied that Hezbollah takes its instructions from Syria, saying that Syria is only interested in the militia because of its concern for the Lebanese population and Hezbollah's goal of liberating Lebanese land seized by Israel.

Noam Chomsky, er, Rosen, wins award

By JOYCE SINGER-D'APRILE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Comedian Noam Rosen was recently a winner at the 2001 Canadian Comedy Awards for his critically acclaimed one-man show Noam Chomsky is an Asshole.

"I was excited – and nervous. About five seconds beforehand, I thought maybe I had a chance at winning this, when a cheer went up as my name was announced," Rosen said.

It's a career highlight. Especially when he struck gold with his very first nomination, which was in the Best One-Person Show category.

But it was a bittersweet victory for Rosen, 29. His girlfriend Mary Crosby, and her comedy group The GTO's, lost in the category of Best Sketch Troupe.

"My category was second and hers was third. After [I was] handed my award, I was ushered to the side room where all these people were taking pictures… I realized I should probably smile, so I did that. And that's it.

"Then I'm in the VIP room, watching on the monitor, when – oh no! She didn't win. So I had about a full 20 seconds of enjoyment, until that disappointment… But it was a fun night otherwise."

The prize is sweet revenge and doubly gratifying. "In grade school, I went to an art school, where I was kicked out of the drama program. They didn't like me. I was funny, and apparently comedy isn't part of drama," he said.

"I thought about it at the awards show. There were plenty of negative things I could have said, but I decided to be gracious and take the high road.

Noam Rosen

"Overnight I became the establishment!" Rosen laughed. "Luckily I don't make a lot of money at it, so my street credibility is still valid. Bluma Appel, who is so adorable, gave out the bursaries. There was a $1,000 prize, which makes me very happy."

He has created a niche for his work, with his weekly Sunday Night Pirate Video Cabaret shows at Clinton's Tavern. This unique program has attracted a loyal, hip, cult following. And it certainly doesn't hurt business any when superstar pals like Mike Myers drop by. Myers has even been known to take the mike for impromptu Q&A sessions, and to test-drive his latest routines there.

Those with keen eyes may also recognize Rosen from several commercials. One of his more popular commercials is for FUJI film, where three geeks wangle their way into a an ultra-chic party. They accomplish this amazing feat by showing a photograph of a hunky guy, to a pretty girl peering through a peephole in the door. Rosen is the geek in the middle.

"I have never met Noam Chomsky, but I don't like Noam Chomsky," Rosen said, explaining his show.

Ruth Rubin, the Yiddish folksinger and folklorist who died last year, is to be the focus of an evening of tribute next month at Temple Sinai.

Folksinger and ethnomusicologist Naomi Bell is one of several musicians slated to perform in honour of Rubin. Others include cantor and folksinger Ruth Seligman-Slater, and Syd Dolgay and Jerry Gray, past and present members of The Travellers.

Composer Ben Steinberg and Rubin's sister Esther Spivack Marks are preparing spoken tributes. Also, A Life of Song, a video portrait of Ruth Rubin by Cindy Marshall, is to be screened.

Rubin, who died on June 11, 2000, was an internationally renowned collector, performer and interpreter of Yiddish folksong. Her tireless research, numerous publications, articles and recordings place her in the front rank of Yiddish musical anthologists.

Event sponsored by the UJA FEDERATION committee for Yiddish, Friends of Yiddish, Winchevksy Centre, Workmen's Circle and Yiddish Kultur Gezelschaft. Temple Sinai, 210 Wilson Ave. Tuesday, June 12, 7:30 p.m. Admission is free but donations appreciated. 416-789-5502.

The Canadian Friends of Herzog Hospital present an evening of stand-up comedy featuring Lawrence Morgenstern, Steve Levine, Simon Rakoff and Daniel Cole. The MC is Les Aaron. Proceeds will go towards a playground at Herzog Hospital in Jerusalem. A reception and silent auction follow.

Leah Posluns Theatre, 4588 Bathurst St. $25. Thursday, May 24, 7:30 p.m. 416-256-4222.

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

Music and Drama

• The Tarragon Theatre's annual spring arts fair offers many mini-performances, including puppet shows and other fare for children, and it's all free. 30 Bridgman Ave. May 12 and 13, noon to 6 p.m. 416-536-5018.

• Pianist Yefim Bronfman plays a program of Janacek, Rachmaninoff and Brahms with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, Roy Thomson Hall, May 16 and 17, 8 p.m. Admission to a pre-concert performance of chamber music, beginning at 6:45 p.m., is $5, or free to ticket holders of the 8 p.m. performance.

• Rob Becker's Defending the Caveman, a hilariously insightful play about the ways men and women relate, returns to the Pantages Theatre, May 30 to June 17. $25-$69.50. 416-870-8000.

• Involving "a meadow full of downcast Israelites, boisterous Philistines, minstrels and acrobats," the Westben production of the biblical story of Samson is scheduled for The Barn, in Campbellford, Ont., June 7 to 17. $30-$20. 877-883-5777.

Mirvishes Acquire Pantages: Ed and David Mirvish, the father and son team who own and operate two major theatres in Toronto, will soon add a third theatre to their operation. Effective in September, Mirvish Productions will acquire the 2,300-seat Pantages Theatre as a third Mirvish venue in addition to the 1,500-seat Royal Alexandra and the 2,000-seat Princess of Wales.

The Mirvishes' present theatres are occupied with two long-running productions – Mamma Mia! and The Lion King, respectively. As a result, they have had to move their regular subscription series to other Toronto venues, including the Pantages. A former vaudeville house and movie palace dating from 1929, the Pantages was lavishly restored in 1989.

"By folding the Pantages Theatre into the Mirvish operation, it strengthens our ability to deliver both long-running shows and subscription shows to Toronto audiences," said David Mirvish.

At the Galleries

• Thornhill Visual Artists studio tour and sale occurs in a variety of locations, May 12 and 13, 10 to 5 p.m. 905-889-9703. thornhillva.hypermart.net

• Perceptions of Light, a multimedia documentary about persons who are deaf-blind, is on view at the Nathan Shiff Gallery, 1252 Danforth Ave., now until June 2. "The work is a journey of discovery beyond the world of disabilities; it is a testament to the strength and elevation of the human spirit."

Passages: Organizers of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival announced last week that Debra Ruth Plotkin, the festival's former director of programming, died last November at the age of 46. A memorial service to celebrate "the life, humour and wisdom of our wonderful friend," is scheduled for May 27, 3 to 5 p.m., at the Bloor Cinema, 506 Bloor St. W.

Wall panels dedicated at Kolel

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Four wall panels, made by noted Israeli fibre artist Haya Nativ in memory of two boys who died at the age of 24, were recently dedicated in the sanctuary at Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning.

The theme of the panels is The Cycle of Life, taken from the quotation, "Your elders shall dream dreams and your youth shall see visions" (Joel 3:1). Multi-layered screens of stained glass silk technique, each one expresses the individual sentiments and symbols of the year's four seasons.

Robert David Sage died 20 years ago in Toronto and Lior Harari died in Israel exactly 20 years later. Nativ was commissioned to create her artwork by Selma Sage, Robert's mother, but while she was creating the work, Nativ's nephew, an Israeli pilot, died while on duty. Sage and Nativ agreed to dedicate the works to both Sage's son and Nativ's nephew.

A recent dedication ceremony was held on the yahrzeit of Harari's death. It was also the week of the yahrzeit of Rabbi Elyse Goldstein's sister Marsha, who died eight years ago at the age of 40. Rabbi Goldstein is Kolel's rabbinic director.

"The beauty brought from sadness is a living testament to the lives of these young souls to the renewal of spirit and to the reminder of the multi-layers of life," says Sage, a noted educator and lecturer.

"At the dedication, it was important for me and Haya to create a work of art to show that Robert and Lior had lived and experienced the beauty of the changes in seasons."

Kolel is located at 151 Eglinton Ave. W. Visitors are welcome to view the pieces Monday to Thursday during business hours.

"The show is half-live and half-video. It's kind of a hodge-podge of scenes. The whole thing stems from the coincidence that we share the same name. He's a professor at MIT who is ultra, ultra, left. But I'd hate him more if he were ultra, ultra, right. He's technically a professor of linguistics, but he also dabbles in Middle East political theory.

"I have no problem with his linguistics... Maybe he's a great linguist. I don't know and I don't care. It's his stance on Israel that bothers me. He's very, very anti-Israel and he's Jewish. I don't really go into his politics or his linguistics, during the show.

"It's really more about the fact that we share the same name. It's about having to go into a very detailed explanation of my name whenever I'm introduced to people. They have all these questions about the name Noam, because it's so unusual. Or if they are familiar with Chomsky, then they immediately say, 'Oh, like Noam Chomsky.'"

Perhaps the day will come when Chomsky is mistaken for Rosen, instead of the other way around. That would be great personal victory after Noam Rosen's professional triumph. And good for a laugh.

TRAVEL TALK

BY BILL GLADSTONE

THIS YEAR IN JERUSALEM: SUPPORT FOR ISRAEL

Travel Talk recently had the pleasure of speaking with several Toronto Jews who spent Passover in Israel, thus fulfilling the seder-night wish to be "next year in Jerusalem."

Observing the holiday with relatives in the Orthodox Jerusalem neighbourhood of Givat Shaul was "a goosebump-raising experience" for Barbara Organ, who spent most of her stay in Jerusalem, but also travelled by rented car to Haifa and Tel Aviv.

"I walked around Jerusalem and took buses as much as I could," she says. "There was a little girl in the family that I'm crazy about, so we went to playgrounds a lot."

Taxi drivers thanked Organ for coming during such a difficult period, she says, but nowhere did she actually detect any difficulties. Foreign visitors seemed few and far between. Arriving at Yad Vashem one day at 9:30 a.m., she quickly concluded that she "was the only one there," although several busloads of visitors arrived later that morning.

Likewise, "I went to the Western Wall and while it seemed busy, it didn't look to me like there were many tourists."

Seeing scenes of turmoil on television left her apprehensive about going to Israel, she admits. "But once I got there, I didn't feel at risk at all. I had no hesitation riding the bus or going anywhere .... I felt very safe. Life goes on. You don't notice any problems."

Toronto dentist Jeffrey Erlich and his family spent two weeks in Israel, staying in a flat in the Jerusalem neighbourhood of Ramot, and travelling to Netanya, Tel Aviv and the Dead Sea.

In Jerusalem they travelled unhesitatingly through all but the Arab sections. They even went to the sandbagged and well-fortified Gilo neighbourhood, the last Jewish stronghold before Bethlehem, and ventured by daylight to Efrat along a road not recommended for visitors.

"Wherever we went, we never felt that we were in any danger of confrontation," he says. "In fact, I probably feel more at risk in downtown Miami than in Israel."

In Jerusalem "I let my [14-year-old] daughter go on her own. She went to Ben Yehuda Street and wandered around on her own, no problem."

Except for some touring in and around Tel Aviv and Haifa, Debbie Shecter and five family members spent most of their two weeks in Jerusalem during a recent trip to Israel. "We were in the centre of the city every day," she says. "We went to Ben Yehuda Street, ate in restaurants, sat outside, went to the mall. We always felt safe."

Family members visited the Israel Museum, the Botanical Gardens, the Old City and other areas, finding few foreign visitors but no indication of trouble. Having completed her 26th visit to Israel, Shecter emphasizes the importance of showing support for Israel by visiting, even in difficult times.

"What I always say is that if you don't turn on the TV, you don't know what's happening."

For travel professional David Freudmann, his latest trip to Israel was as exciting as many others he has made over the years.

He and his party visited Herzlia, Tiberias, and several smaller centres in the Galilee. "We drove everywhere, and went well off the beaten track. We had very pleasant, very quiet drives everywhere. We found no problem. We didn't feel threatened or afraid. The proof is that I wouldn't have taken a 2-1/2 year old granddaughter with me if I had been afraid."

The beach in Herzlia, he recalls, "was crowded with people. It was a pleasure to see all the beachside restaurants serving their food, their matzot. In Jerusalem we walked around everywhere except the Arab market and East Jerusalem."

According to the Israel Government Tourist Office, several Canadian-Jewish groups have recently visited Israel. They include Birthright, the March of the Living, and a group of 13 Conservative and Reform rabbis who went on a brief mission last week. Since it benefits Israel spiritually and economically, let's hope that more Canadian Jews visit Israel soon.

FROM GENERATION TO GENERATION: Mi Dor L'Dor: From Generation to Generation in Song unites the Chai Singers, conducted by Varda Hall Berenstein (pictured here) and The Renanim Children's Choir and Renanim Youth Ensemble, led by Susan Michaels. Renanim is a spirited group of young singers from across Toronto who meet at the Koffler School of Music. The Chai singers have a few more years experience – some members go back to 1961 and he founding of the Toronto Hadassah-Wizo Choir. The concert is at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, Toronto on May 14, 7:30 p.m. tickets are $10 and $8 for seniors and children. Call 416-449-2296

Sunshine illuminates dangers of assimilation

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

Too long, too much nudity and too much Ralph Fiennes.

That was my reaction to my first screening of Sunshine, the sweeping saga about the Sonnenscheins, a Jewish family living in Hungary during the most tumultuous years of the 20th century.

I have changed my mind somewhat after screening the film again, now that it's available on video.

Although the film has several drawbacks including its three hour length, unnecessary nude scenes and Ralph Fiennes playing three roles – the Sonnenschein grandfather, father and son – the film does work. And it works even better on video than it did in the theatres.

Originally, I felt the film might have been more effective as a television miniseries because of its length. But watching at home lets you take a break if you get tired.

The use of Fiennes in three roles does have an advantage. Each character looks like the other, as they might in a real family.

But the most important element of Sunshine is the moral of the story: assimilation does not work.

The main characters try to fit into the mainstream in anti-Semitic Hungary by de-emphasizing their Jewishness. They change their names and even convert to Catholicism.

What the characters fail to realize is that these are only cosmetic changes. No matter what they do, they are still considered Jews by the outside world.

The story begins in the early 20th century, when Emmanuel Sonnenschein uses a family recipe to make a tonic that catapults the family into the world of great wealth and prestige.

Emmanuel's son, Ignatz, builds upon the family's success. He overcomes Hungarian anti-Semitism and becomes a powerful judge.

Ignatz's son, Adam, becomes a world-class fencer and denies his Jewish roots in order to pursue his Olympic dreams and become a lawyer.

Adam's son, Ivan, enters politics after World War II and seeks revenge for the wrongs done to his family. He is transformed by the witchhunts of the Communist regime and the eventual fall of the Iron Curtain.

Sunshine, despite its massive scope, is also a very personal story of three generations of men. Each of the men has his own foibles and personality defects, but with integrity, searches for love and respect.

Sunshine was directed and co-written by renown Hungarian director Istvan Szabo and produced by Canadian filmmaker Robert Lantos.

In many ways, Sunshine combines Szabo's personal memories and intimate knowledge of the subject matter.

"My own experiences certainly influenced the story," Szabo said. "Naturally it was a little autobiographical, but it is more of a case history of one family that goes through what many human beings experienced in this century."

Fiennes gives excellent performances in all three roles and the rest of the cast, including Rosemary Harris, Rachel Weisz, Jennifer Ehle, Molly Parker and Deborah Kara Unger, all give strong performances.

Overall, Sunshine is one of the strongest films to deal with a Jewish topic in some time.

Student athlete pursues hockey at Harvard

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — You're 17 years old, a good hockey player, a top student, and recruits are beating down your door to sign you.

Let's consider the options. On the one hand, you could move from Tier II Junior A onto the roster of a major junior Ontario Hockey League (OHL) team, play for pocket money with a bunch of high school buddies and hope NHL scouts notice you.

On the other hand, you could accept a four-year athletic scholarship from Harvard University (value: $38,000 US per year), play on the school's first division NCAA team, enjoy campus life, get a first-rate education, and hope NHL scouts notice you.

For most guys, the decision would be a no-brainer; for a guy with SAT scores in the stratosphere, who's scoring an 85 average while doing a combined Grade 12 and OAC program, the neurons wouldn't have to get out of first gear to make the decision.

Harvard, here I come.

Andrew Lederman, centreman with the Vaughan Vipers of the Ontario Hockey Association (OHA), has made his decision. Next season he will suit up for the Harvard Crimson as a freshman.

Although scouted by as many as 20 American colleges, including the powerhouse University of Michigan, Wisconsin, Yale and Princeton, Lederman opted for Harvard, where he'll study sciences and pursue his interest in genetics and bio-engineering.

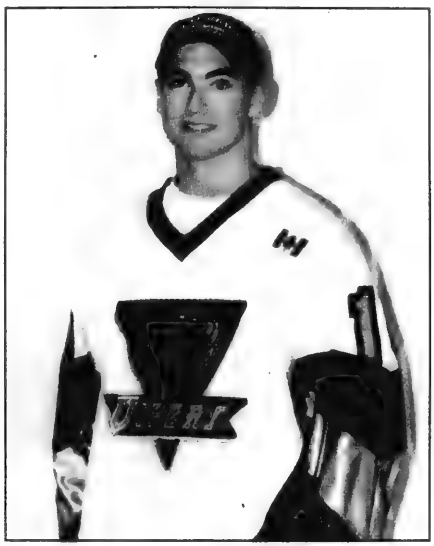
OHL teams also expressed an interest in recruiting the smooth skating set-up man, but his mind was pretty well set on a college education. Lederman even let it be known that a draft selection would be wasted on him, but North Bay Centennials used a late pick to add Lederman to its list of prospects.

"I guess the way I was brought up, I knew in my mind that school was a priority," Lederman said.

His dad, Karl, also advised the younger Lederman to take the Harvard route. The family investigated Andrew's options and after hearing glowing reviews of Harvard's hockey program – it's the school's number 1 sport – and knowing that a Harvard degree is a springboard to just about any career, they chose the Ivy League school.

"My family is ecstatic. I still can't believe it. It'll have to soak in when I get there," Lederman said.

Lederman, who scored a remarkable 1,300 on an SAT (most hockey players get between 800-900), has already spoken to the coaches at Harvard and he's been told what to expect. At first, they plan to install him on Crimson's third line, behind veteran players. By his second and third years, they expect him to move to one of the team's top lines.



Andrew Lederman

Vipers coach Steve Mercer is confident Lederman can be a valuable addition to the Crimson. "I find him a highly skilled player. I think he'll do well at Harvard," Mercer said. "He's a smooth skater with great, soft hands. He's great around the net."

The coach's only caveat is that Lederman must get stronger if he hopes to consistently compete against older college players while developing into an NHL prospect. Lederman is younger and smaller than most of his teammates.

"The strength factor," even in the NCAA, comes into play. "If he follows the program they've given him – and he has a good work ethic – he'll get stronger," Mercer said.

For the past two seasons, Lederman has led the Vipers while continuing to develop a finesse game. In 2000-01, the six-foot, 180-pounder scored 52 points (21 goals, 31 assists) in 49 regular season games. In the playoffs, which the Vipers lost to the Wexford Raiders four games to two, Lederman scored three goals and added five assists.

He and right-winger Rob Kapuscinsky (30 goals, 20 assists) formed the team's main scoring threat, while also killing penalties and working the power play.

Lederman first attracted the attention of scouts three years ago when he played for Upper Canada College and the Toronto Marlboroughs' bantam team. He's been a AAA player since he was nine.

Passing, skating, puck handling and scoring points have been Lederman's trademark, and the player he's compared to – and whom he most admires – is Washington Capitals' Adam Oates.

"I think he's one of the best passers of all time," Lederman said.

The Crimson are no doubt looking forward to the finesse and skill Lederman will add. This past season, Harvard managed a middling 16-15-2 record.

Maccabiah organizers examine security, safety

By RAMI HIPSH
Ha'aretz Sports Correspondent

JERUSALEM — The uncertain security situation in Israel has forced organizers of the 16th Maccabiah Games to revise its estimate of how many participants will travel to Israel to attend the event, which begins on July 16.

Initial estimates of some 5,000 athletes have been scaled down to between 3,500 and 4,000.

Nevertheless, the Games' organizing committee has been encouraged by messages from Maccabi U.S.A. stating that despite warnings issued by the U.S. State Department, the American contingent will be large and complete.

At a safety conference held recently at the Kfar Maccabiah hotel in Tel Aviv, officials responsible for safety said they had fully implemented the lessons of the bridge collapse at the 15th Maccabiah, which cost the lives of four members of the Australian delegation.

Stories that touch the heart

By

ELI RUBENSTEIN ALEC GELCER

In the dead of a South African night

My wife and I were in Cape Town, South Africa, driving home at midnight, when we had a flat tire on a lonely, unlit road, bushes on either side. Crime is rife in South Africa, people are murdered on the roads in broad daylight.

We called the AA on our cellphone and waited anxiously. We felt totally exposed and helpless.

A few cars went by, but no one stopped. Then one car slowed down and pulled over onto the shoulder. "Ah, the AA at last!" I thought.

But the burly individual who emerged was not wearing any identifying uniform. As he approached, I left the car, determined to sell my life dearly if necessary.

"What's the problem?" he asked.

"We have a flat."

"Have you tried to change the tire?" the man asked gruffly.

"No," I said.

"Where's your spare?"

"In the trunk, I guess."

"Open your trunk. Let me see."

Soon he located the spare tire. His face looked grim, pitying. "This tire's completely flat!"

Just then, another car stopped. It was the AA. The burly fellow explained. "His spare is completely flat. He says he has never checked it." They shook their heads sadly at each other.

"I have an idea! I could give him my spare and take his! Would that work?"

The AA man compared the two cars. "No. It wouldn't fit. But I still have a way."

He inflated and changed the tire, assisted by the burly man.

The fellow from AA departed. The other turned to leave, but I stopped him. "Excuse me," I said, "but what's your name?"

"Jack MacAndrew," he said.

"Well, Jack MacAndrew, how is it that of all the people that passed, only you stopped for us?"

Jack pointed his index finger into the air. "Do you see this finger?" he asked. "There is no other finger like it in the world. Nor has there ever been. Nor will there ever be. What it means is that each of us is totally unique and precious.

"So if I come across anyone in trouble, I do my best to help them. Because whoever they are, they are special and precious."

He turned and I called after him: "Jack MacAndrew! I will always remember you and your finger that points to the sky. Go well!"

The Talmud states: "Who is wise? One who learns from every other person." And I will not forget the lesson taught to me on a lonely stretch of road in South Africa by the special and precious Jack MacAndrew.

About Life

Dear Ella,

So I finally meet a decent girl on a blind date. A rare occurrence. One big problem – I can't stand going to a restaurant with her. Picture this: We sit down, great ambiance, great company, great food. The waiter comes over and that's when it starts. The never-ending questions. Do you have any vegetarian dishes (she is not a vegetarian), what's in the sauce, can I have the pasta with penne instead of linguini, can you grill the fish instead of frying it? The question period is as long as the actual dinner.

When the food arrives, that's when I really start to slide down the back of my seat. She starts: I don't think I ordered a baked potato, the vegetables are a bit cold, the salmon isn't done right, I think they did this in butter. Can you call the waiter, I want to send this back. Ahh!! Any cure for this? I think I could like this girl if it wasn't for this quirk.

Order in the Restaurant

Dear Order in the Restaurant

Sounds to me like you were lucky to find a girl who knows what she wants and isn't afraid to go after it.

Granted, your scenario does sound a bit extreme, but in the great scheme of things, if this is your worst problem, then I think you're doing pretty well. Try picking restaurants that are used to demanding patrons. Or maybe, don't go to restaurants so often. Go to movies, plays or parks instead. Bring picnic baskets, cook dinner before you go, or better yet let her cook dinner so she gets exactly what she wants. Eventually you will get to know her likes and dislikes.

All in all, for a picky girl, she seems happy with you. That must say something for your personality as well. You are probably a lot more patient than you're letting on.

There is nothing wrong with asking for and getting exactly what you want and what you're paying for. This little quirk of hers may just come in very handy in other areas of life, when you will need her to speak up. She may even speak up for you some day!

Readers may submit their questions to Ella at The CJN. But Ella is not a professional counsellor. She brings to the questions posed by readers her unique brand of earthy wisdom. Her advice is not a replacement for medical, legal or any other advice. For serious problems, consult a professional.

Acclaimed artist dies at age 78

TORONTO — Aba Bayefsky, whose haunting images of death camp victims haunted the artist as much as the viewer, died May 5 in Toronto. He was 78.

Bayefsky was the dean of Canadian Jewish artists, known best for transmitting his eyewitness accounts of concentration camp horrors to the canvas. It was as an official Canadian war artist that he made his most emotional mark, filling his sketchbooks with dozens of uncompromising works – an oeuvre that left raw emotions for the rest of his life.

Aba Bayefsky sitting in front of The Kaddish Self-Portrait (1980).

"I saw pits with thousands of dead bodies piled in them," he told The CJN in 1998 regarding his visit to Bergen-Belsen, just following its liberation by British troops in the spring of 1945. "They were just lumps, that's all. They had trucks backing up to these pits and they were just throwing them in. It had a profound impact on me."

His work is displayed at the Canadian War Museum and in public and private collections around the world.

Many war artists had a bitter time recording the images they saw, but perhaps few more so than Bayefsky.

Day's CJC speech brings him plaudits and trouble

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — While delegates to last week's Canadian Jewish Congress national plenary couldn't have been more delighted with Stockwell Day's rousingly pro-Israel speech in which he pinned much of the blame for Middle East violence squarely on Palestinians, the remarks have also had the following effects:

They managed to further alienate him from some of his remaining supporters; they raised the ire of the government, which accused him of seriously deviating from, and possibly undermining, Canada's long-standing policy of neutrality in the Mideast conflict; and they have led to calls for his resignation from Canadian-Arab groups (one of which has threatened to sue him for inciting hatred against Arabs).

Blames Palestinians for violence

At a news conference in London, Ont., on Saturday, angry representatives of Arab and Muslim groups called for Day's ouster.

"He is not fit to be the leader of the Opposition," said Munir El-Kassem of the Canadian Islamic Congress. "A national leader is expected to unite all segments of society, not to instigate racial hatred and intolerance."

In his call for Day to step down, El-Kassem was joined by Atif Kubursi, president of the National Council of Arab-Canada Relations, which earlier had threatened to sue Day over his remarks to the CJC.

"Mr. Day is not entitled to foment strife amongst communities," said Kubursi. "He is not entitled to build his faltering leadership on a maligned people."

Those comments came a day after the Canadian Alliance leader tried to soften his remarks.

The News in Brief

Canada

Mullins Returns

VANCOUVER — Eustace Mullins, conspiracy theorist and author of several virulently anti-Semitic books, is scheduled to appear at a New Age festival in British Columbia in August. Festival organizers had offered Mullins' books for sale on their mail-order Internet site, but the site has been shut down by Canada Customs for offering hate propaganda. In February, Mullins was scheduled to appear at a New Age health show in Toronto, but the show's organizers cancelled his appearance when sponsors pulled their support. The Pacific region of Canadian Jewish Congress is considering asking the show's sponsors to do the same, while B'nai Brith Canada has called on federal officials to prevent Mullins from entering the country.

Israel

Immigration Worries

JERUSALEM — The chair of the Jewish Agency for Israel says that if aliyah continues its downward trend, only some 52,000 new immigrants are expected to arrive in Israel this year. Sallai Meridor says a number of factors have contributed to the decline in immigration from former Soviet states, including better political and economic situations there and the ongoing violence in Israel.

Gay Gathering

JERUSALEM — Israel's umbrella organization for homosexual groups has won a bid to host World Pride, a week-long international gay, lesbian and bisexual gathering in Tel Aviv in 2004. It will mark the first time the gay pride event has taken place anywhere in the Middle East.

High-Tech Spies?

JERUSALEM — Laid-off Israeli high-tech workers are finding a new source of employment: the Mossad. The Israeli daily Ma'ariv has reported that some 1,000 former computer employees have responded to newspaper ads seeking candidates for the Mossad's technology division.

Barenboim 'Outraged'

JERUSALEM — Pianist and conductor Daniel Barenboim said he is outraged by Knesset attempts to prevent him from staging an opera by Richard Wagner. "I can identify completely with the people who don't want to listen to it," Barenboim told Israel Radio, "but I can't identify with the fact that they are trying to stop other people from hearing it."

World

Hungarians Sue

MIAMI — Hungarian Holocaust survivors and their heirs have filed a class-action lawsuit here against the United States, seeking restitution for treasures allegedly stolen by the Nazis and later taken by U.S. troops. The lawsuit deals with the so-called Hungarian Gold Train, a shipment of Jewish property seized by the Nazis that fell into U.S. hands at the end of World War II.

eBay Lauded

LOS ANGELES — Jewish groups are applauding eBay's decision to ban Nazi memorabilia from its online auction site, effective May 17. The decision exempts wartime German stamps and coins, as well as books and movies about World War II. The Simon Wiesenthal Centre had lobbied for the policy change for two years.

Assad's Response

DAMASCUS — Syrian President Bashar Assad brushed off criticism for anti-Jewish remarks he made recently, saying Arabs cannot be accused of being anti-Semitic because they are Semites themselves. Jews "accuse us, the Semites, of being anti-Semitic," Assad said at a farewell ceremony for Pope John Paul, who left Syria for Malta. In his address welcoming the Pope, Assad said the suffering of Palestinians caused by Israel was similar to that of Jesus at the hands of Jews.

Germans Polled

BERLIN — Some 60 percent of Germans surveyed feel neither guilty nor responsible for the Holocaust, and 45 percent said they are tired of being confronted with the Nazi past, according to a new poll. The survey, published in Der Spiegel magazine, also had 28 percent saying Hitler would have been a great statesman had he not instigated World War II and the Holocaust.

Female Rabbi

VIENNA — A child survivor of the Holocaust has become the first female rabbi in the country her family fled some 63 years ago. After her appointment was announced in March, Eveline Goodman-Thau, 67, was welcomed last week to Vienna's 160-member liberal congregation, Or Chadash, where she will serve for at least one year. Her family fled the country in 1938 and survived World War II in hiding in Holland.

Israeli Embassy Opens in Berlin

BERLIN — Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres offered a prayer for peace in the Middle East and for the victims of the Holocaust during a ceremony last week marking the opening of the new Israeli Embassy here.

With some 2,000 people attending last week's ceremony, Peres called the embassy "not only a house of Israel, but also a house representing all those driven out of their homes" by the Nazis.

Fischer called the embassy's opening "an extraordinary, special event for Israelis and Germans."

The festivities, which included a live klezmer band and kosher hors d'oeuvres prepared by the embassy chef, took place under the watchful gaze of several masked, black-clad sharpshooters poised on the embassy roof.

The new structure is faced with Jerusalem stone and consists of six segments, meant as a reminder of the six million Jews murdered in the Holocaust.

It was built on land purchased in 1928 by a Jewish businessman, Hermann Schondorf, who was forced to emigrate in 1934, a year after the Nazis came to power.

The building was constructed by the same firm that built Adolf Hitler's Berlin bunker.

Community studies surprise school tax credit

By RON CSILLAG

Ontario Budget '01

TORONTO — The long and arduous battle for public funding of Ontario's Jewish day schools came a step closer to realization with last week's historic provincial budget – the first time ever the government has addressed the issue.

The budget, brought down by Finance Minister Jim Flaherty, took the Jewish community completely by surprise with its inclusion of a provincial tax credit for parents of children in independent and private, faith-based schools.

Starting next year, these parents will be eligible for a tax credit of up to $700 per child, or 10 percent of the first $7,000 of tuition fees. To be phased in over five years, the credit will increase 20 percent per year, and eventually, will be worth up to $3,500 per child annually.

The move will eventually pump some $300 million a year into funding the 102,000 students in private schools, including the 12,000 children enrolled in Ontario's 42 Jewish day schools and yeshivot.

"It's a huge step but not a conclusion," said Ed Morgan, the new chair of Canadian Jewish Congress's Ontario region. "It's the first step toward full funding. But we're really happy with it."

Community officials, who pored over the budget last week, were plainly caught off guard with the provision. Reaction was limited to generalities.

There are a myriad of details yet to be worked out, foremost among them, how the credit will be implemented and how it will interact with existing federal/provincial charitable credits against the religious portion of education.

It's not known whether the credit will co-exist with other measures, or replace them.

The "most generous" interpretation is that years down the road, between all the tax measures available, parents could be relieved of up to 75 per cent of tuition costs, Morgan stated.

CJC allayed concerns that Queen's Park's move comes with strings attached.

"We don't expect a lot of strings," said Simon Rosenblum, CJC Ontario region's director of public policy. He said because the initiative came from the finance and not the education department, there won't be pedagogical criteria attached as preconditions.

Rosenblum called the development "a significant victory" for the Jewish community. "It's not the end of the road but we have to respect it as a very important transitional measure."

Much of the mechanics will be left up to existing regulations, said Morgan, a lawyer who argued, and lost, the funding case before the Supreme Court of Canada in 1997.

He said CJC is "very concerned" at how the tax break will affect parents of children whose Jewish education is subsidized by the community. "That's not yet clear."

Government representatives clearly played their cards close to their vests. There was no hint of what was to come when Premier Mike Harris addressed the CJC national plenary here just two days before the budget. Mainly, Harris used the occasion to laud the Jewish community's accomplishments and recount his two trips to Israel.

And on May 6, Tory MPP Tina Molinari announced at a plenary session on school funding that she had had a meeting with Flaherty and attorney general David Young to discuss a provincial tax credit, an idea she said was well-received. Young then told The CJN that the idea was still in early stages, and he advised a go-slow approach.

It's too early to comment on details, but Lou Greenbaum, president of Associated Hebrew Day Schools of Toronto, the country's largest day school system, welcomed the development.

Yom Yerushalayim

From the editor's desk

Last July, at Camp David, Yasser Arafat and his colleagues, for the first time before a western audience, challenged the Jewish historical relationship to Jerusalem. He and his negotiating team asserted there was no proof of the existence of the Temple.

Arafat argued that Israel's claim to the Temple Mount was not based on fact or on any deep attachment to the place. Rather, according to the PA president, it was based simply on Israel's desire to control territory and people, and thus, merely colonial.

Israelis were shocked; Jews around the world were stunned into disbelief; others following the progress of the peace talks, hoping for a breakthrough, were also left gasping for air, as it were, discomfited by the questions and the statements that seemed too absurd for words, yet, sadly, not too absurd to have been uttered by the Palestinian leadership.

But the questions were asked and the statements were made. Jewish, indeed Western, history had been dismissed by the PA as an irrelevant detail. And thus Arafat's mask fell to the floor. We saw his real face and the true intentions that gave it such malevolent definition. He and the PA leadership are determined to dismantle Israel as a Jewish State.

His logic was as simple as it was perverted.

Without a factual, historical connection to Jerusalem, Jews could have no factual or historical connection to any part of the land. According to the PA thesis, the arrival of mostly European, non-indigenous, immigrants to Palestine since the beginning of the last century was therefore nothing but a displacement of local inhabitants by foreigners.

Refracted through this distorted prism, the UN resolution, which legitimized that displacement, was seen by the PA leaders, as a result, as lacking any authority, an aggression against the local Arab peoples. Moreover, they contend, the displacement was a U.S.-Europe-inspired manipulation of events, to the detriment of local Arab peoples, based on fraud and ruse (namely, in their eyes, the so-called Holocaust).

The PA's opposition to the "Judaizing" of Jerusalem, as they cynically refer to the Jewish relationship to Jerusalem, is but the companion argument to their demand of the right of all Palestinian refugees to return to their pre-1948 homes.

They are two sides of the same PA coin, weighted against the belief that a Jewish State belongs in the area, and against compromise, accommodation or any willingness to live side by side with a "foreign" Jewish State.

This coin must have no purchase.

Arafat's design is plain. Our resolve against it must be equally plain.

Next week, on the 28th day of Iyar, (May 21), we will celebrate Yom Yerushalayim (Jerusalem Day). Thirty-four years ago, on that eventful day, IDF paratroopers reunited the old city with the new city of Jerusalem.

The Jordanians had unilaterally divided the city 19 years earlier, razed the Old City's synagogues, defaced, vandalized and desecrated almost all of the Jewish religious markers there.

With the terse yet profoundly moving utterance by the paratroopers' commander, Mota Gur, "Har habayit b'yadeinu" ("the Temple Mount is in our hands"), Jewish sovereignty was finally re-extended to a united Jerusalem after a hiatus of some 1,900 years.

It falls to us to remember, recount and commemorate that special, metaphysical moment of modern history, just as it falls to us to remember, recount and commemorate our special, metaphysical bond to Jerusalem itself.

Doing so would be both an affirmation and a declaration: an affirmation of our own present-day Jewish resolve and a declaration that we will not simply surrender the Jewish past to Arafat, his colleagues in the PA, his fundamentalist allies in Hamas, Islamic Jihad or Hezbollah, or his supporters in the Arab world, all of whom are intent on negating the Jewish future.

In his outstanding work The Jerusalem Anthology: A Literary Guide, JPS, 1995, an invaluably rich and inspiring collection of essays and writing, Reuven Hammer makes the following powerful point in his introduction: "It would not be an exaggeration to say that no city in the history of the nations has been as important a part of the consciousness of a people [the Jews] for as long and continuous a period of time as has Jerusalem."

That statement is our beginning point in Israel's and the Jewish people's struggle against the prevarications of the PA leadership. To paraphrase from Dylan Thomas, we must and we will "rage, rage against the lying and the distorting of what is right."

Jewish special ed professionals gather in Toronto

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Jewish community will pay a heavy price as a result of "inappropriate education" not geared to the individual requirements of special needs students, warns Rabbi Martin Schloss.

The veteran New York educator, who began his career in the field of special education in 1969, chaired the recent annual conference of the Consortium of Special Educators in Central Agencies for Jewish Education, held in Toronto.

Hosted by the Board of Jewish Education (BJE) at She'arim Hebrew Day School, which is geared to students with learning disabilities, the three-day conference included sessions on Hebrew Remediation Techniques and Judaica Program Modifications, and Including Children with Special Needs in Jewish Schools.

Rabbi Schloss

There were also visits to the Zareinu Educational Centre, whose students have developmental and physical disorders, and the Reena Foundation's Toby and Henry Battle Developmental Centre for developmentally handicapped adults.

At She'arim, the 23 participating North American educators representing Toronto, Montreal, and a number of American cities observed a lesson that put into practice the school's philosophy, based on the work of Israeli psychologist Reuven Feuerstein.

"Enmeshed in that approach is the building of competency through developing strategies leading to independent thinking and self-esteem," said Dori Levine, the BJE's special education consultant.

In a joint interview last week following the conclusion of the conference, Rabbi Schloss, director of the Special Education Centre of the Board of Jewish Education of Greater New York and a co-founder 15 years ago of the consortium, said he believes the Jewish educational system needs to "better address [and] identify needs and learning styles at the earliest possible time to promote successful education for the child based on his or her abilities."

Dori Levine

"We have not fully understood how successful our children can be, given the right intervention techniques," Levine said. Attempts to help special needs students have failed when they reflected "what the system wanted the child to have" rather than what the child actually needed.

But how realistic is it to think that each child can be looked at individually within the Jewish education system? Levine answered with a question of her own: "Do we have any right in the world not to?"

With gifted students, for example, there is a "good likelihood" they will be lost to the Jewish community, said Rabbi Schloss. "They will be bored, they will not be challenged, they will seek their education elsewhere, or they will simply underperform and their God-given skills will be underused or not used at all."

The situation is changing, according to the rabbi, with larger numbers of special needs students becoming more successful academically than ever before.

As one example, Levine mentioned a She'arim alumnus who has graduated from Yeshiva University and is now working on a degree in osteopathic medicine.

In Toronto, the BJE has just completed a two-year study on special needs services to determine needs and gaps. "We are now trying to restructure and implement massive changes," she said.

The next step, Levine indicated, is for the BJE to hire a central department director of special education services. "Hopefully through the next couple of years we will implement more changes. It will be a gradual process."

Among the recommendations of the 30-page report was the establishment of a central resource centre for parents, teachers, and others working with special needs students, like assistants, volunteers and mentors who often are given minimal instruction.

Levine envisions a situation where a teacher having trouble with a particular student would be able to come to the centre and ask for ideas. "Perhaps someone could go out to that teacher and observe that child. There are so many possibilities we could develop."

Among the professionals who need help are "classroom teachers who have non-homogeneous classes, who must differentiate their instruction and deal with many children with many different diagnoses and indications," according to Levine. "They're floundering."

Special needs students include those who are homebound or institutionalized, those with developmental disabilities ranging from mild to severe, and giftedness – not to mention more complicated variations such as giftedness combined with a learning disability.

Historically, gifted students tend to be "somewhat ignored" at special education conferences, although there are "models of initiatives" and giftedness was addressed at the conference here, the rabbi said. "It is our position that they are as inappropriately addressed as those having difficulty learning."

Jewish education said key to Jewish continuity

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish education – for this generation as well as the next – is key to perpetuating continuity, World Jewish Congress president Edgar Bronfman told the closing luncheon session of last week's Canadian Jewish Congress national plenary.

In a rambling talk that included recollections of his heady days of negotiating Jewish freedom with top Soviet leaders, Bronfman returned repeatedly to the theme of Jewish education.

"You can't expect your children to do what you can't do," the scion of the Canadian distilling family told delegates. "Don't leave it all to your children and grandchildren."

Bronfman was presented with CJC's Saul Hayes Human Rights Award. A video tribute from longtime community activist and Bronfman family friend Sol Kanee was shown.

CJC Plenary

For more coverage please see pages 14, 15, 27

The 71-year-old Bronfman, who has headed the WJC for 20 years, announced he will seek another term as president. He spoke soon after greetings were brought to the plenary by Ontario Premier Mike Harris.

In his role as the world's top Jewish official, Bronfman has met with 55 heads of state, often in places where Jewish communities face danger. He was a major force in convincing the Soviets to open the doors to Jewish emigration, and his efforts prodded Switzerland to confront its past on dormant Holocaust-era bank accounts.

The need to strengthen Jewish education among children is paramount, he said. "We will try to educate them any way we can" – through schools, summer camps and programs that include Birthright, which sends young Diaspora Jews on free trips to Israel, subsidized partly by his family.

But he also called on today's parents and grandparents not to abandon their Jewish education.

"Please learn how to be proud Jews, so you can learn to talk to your children and grandchildren as free and questioning people," Bronfman said.

The current violence between Israel and Palestinians "will be of long duration and will go through some stages of extreme intensity," predicted CJC's new national president in his incoming remarks.

The turmoil's potential to spill over into Canadian communities "is very real," Keith Landy said in his installation address.

He pointed to the recent trial in Los Angeles of Ahmed Rassam, who was convicted of infiltrating the United States to commit acts of terror. Rassam resided in Canada illegally for six years, a situation that "brought our country face to face with the abomination that is terrorism."

- Intensifying the relationship with members of Parliament and civil servants, partly through the establishment of a "Jewish Community Advocacy roundtable" in Ottawa consisting of Jewish MPs and senators and those representatives with large Jewish constituencies.
- Expanding relations with Francophone, aboriginal, ethnocultural and other faith communities, and strengthening links to the evangelical community to harness "its strong support for Israel." However, Landy stressed, ties to evangelical Christians will not deter CJC's efforts to "forcefully" discourage the missionary activities of Jews for Jesus-type groups.
- Working with the federal government to ensure that the Zionism-equals-racism issue does not re-surface at a United Nations conference on racism this summer. Failing that, Ottawa should consider boycotting the conference.
- Continuing CJC's ongoing work on a variety of issues: fighting anti-Semitism and hatemongering, bringing closure to a number of cases of alleged Nazi war criminals in Canada, securing compensation and restitution for Holocaust survivors and their families, and thwarting domestic anti-Israel measures.

Israel Funwalk to coincide with Yom Yerushalayim

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — This year more than ever, organizers of the annual Israel Funwalk feel a need to show their support for Israel.

"There's so much more talk about solidarity," said Elyza Litwin Polsky, who is co-chairing the May 21 walk along with Abe Glowinsky. "There's almost a need to be at the walk."

Ten thousand blue ribbons are ready to be handed out to walkers at the beginning of the event, in response to the kidnapping last fall of three Israeli soldiers and one Israeli citizen by Hezbollah terrorists.

Coincidentally, the date chosen, on the basis of minimizing conflicts with other community events, is – in addition to being Victoria Day – Yom Yerushalayim. "So it's very apropos," said Glowinsky.

The annual event, held under the auspices of UJA FEDERATION, usually attracts up to 10,000 people.

"It's probably the largest single event in the Jewish community in Toronto," said Glowinsky, adding that it took 10 months of planning and there will be more than 500 volunteers just on the day of the walk.

In a prepared statement issued by the federation, Glowinsky also noted that the walk provides a setting where "we can celebrate Israel's accomplishments while people from all streams of Judaism and political backgrounds unite."

The seven-km route begins at Nathan Phillips Square at 10:30 a.m. (registration from 9:15) and ends with festivities at Ontario Place. There will be three checkpoints along the way – the TD Centre, Alexandra Park and Trinity Bellwoods Park.

Last year, when 8,000 walkers raised $200,000 for the federation, a "Funrun" for adults was introduced, which will be part of the event this year as well. A new and gently used clothing drive for Jewish Family & Child Service's Just-A-Second Shop will also be held at Nathan Phillips Square.

Fund-raising incentives include up to four free Ontario Place passes per person for the day of the walk, for every $36 raised.

For both Glowinsky and Litwin Polsky, the walk will be a family affair. Glowinsky's wife and four children will be walking or volunteering with him, and Litwin Polsky – who will forego the actual walking because she is expecting her first child – will be joined by a large contingent of extended family.

The public, not the courts, should decide

The National Council on Canada-Arab Relations (NCCAR) has set an inappropriate, perhaps even dangerous precedent, by threatening to sue the leader of the Opposition, Stockwell Day, for allegedly inciting hatred against Arabs, as a result of his speech last week to the Canadian Jewish Congress. Day's address dealt with a number of issues, including the federal government's Middle East policies. In the context of reviewing those policies, Day offered a negative opinion of, inter alia, Yasser Arafat's trustworthiness.

We support Day's assessment of the Palestinian leader and of the reasons for the deterioration in the situation "on the ground" in the Middle East. Indeed we are grateful that Day had the resolve and the courage to put his views on the public record. But our support of Day's statement is hardly surprising; nor is the disagreement of the NCCAR.

The substantive soundness of his views is not the point at issue here, although it is worth noting that Marcus Gee, veteran political analyst with the Globe and Mail, wrote that Day had "courageously" spoken the truth. What is at issue is the threat by the NCCAR that it will seek to legally censure the leader of the Opposition for his remarks. Surely, in a parliamentary democracy, the NCCAR has other, more appropriate political remedies to invoke against Day.

The public, not the courts, should be asked to determine the worthiness of Day's remarks and whether there should be any political consequences to him as a result.

Welcome first step

The CJN commends the Ontario government for its announcement last week that it will provide a tax credit to parents of children in independent and private, faith-based schools for a portion of the tuition of their children's education.The credit is limited to a maximum of $3,500 and will be phased in over five years.

The evidence from other jurisdictions in this country simply does not support the charge from some quarters that public assistance for private, faith-based education is harmful, let alone ruinous, to the publicly funded education system. The government's decision is therefore laudably consistent with the tolerance and diversity that are the foundation stones of the multiculturalism enshrined in our constitution.

It is also laudably consistent with the fundamental imperatives of conscience, namely, the need to make right what is wrong: the currently unjust, unfair, discriminatory system of education funding in Ontario. It is thus not a perfect response, but it is at least, finally, a first welcome step.

Do not underestimate Jewish spirit

Before Yom Ha'atzmaut, the radio stations kept talking about how everyone was down because of "the situation" and people would stay home instead of going on tiyulim around the country because they were afraid and depressed. But the opposite happened – one million people left their homes in droves to go to the country's parks and sites. There was traffic everywhere. The radio stations kept on having to announce the parks that were full to capacity so people wouldn't try to go there, and it sounded as if every existing park was full. It just goes to show that you can't underestimate the Jewish spirit, and radio stations can't dictate people's feelings. Israelis love their country and no terrorists are going to stop them from seeing it.

Lying Becomes Fashionable

Every day we read in the newspapers, hear on the radio and see on television lies being told, and we never seem to see any denunciation or refutation of these lies. Ultimately, they become acceptable as the truth.

For instance, Bashar Assad, in greeting Pope John Paul during his recent visit to Syria, accused the Jews of persecuting Jesus Christ. It is a well-known fact, acknowledged by the Catholic Church, of which the Pope is the spiritual leader, that it was in fact the Romans who persecuted and then killed him. And yet neither the Pope nor any other Christian leader has condemned these remarks.

Yasser Arafat keeps saying that he wants to sign a "peace of the brave" treaty with Israel, but at the same time encourages the Palestinians to continue the intifadah until they get everything they want.

The Palestinians claim that they can trace their ancestry back 5,000 years to the Canaanites, and also, that they are the first Christians.

Why are these statements not exposed for what they are?

Inappropriate words in headline

The May 10 issue of The CJN has a picture on the front page along with a caption that says rabbis "blitz" Ottawa. I would like to inform the editorial staff that the word "blitz" is the shortening of the Nazi military term "Blitzkrieg," literally "lightning war" – a brutal, full force, surprise attack on an unsuspecting neighbour.

"Blitzkreig" was first used by the German army in the Spanish Civil War and then to attack Poland, Czechoslovakia, Belgium and the Netherlands. Rommel later used it in Africa. I was puzzled that a Jewish publication would employ this term as a metaphor, since it is loaded with such awful associations.

Greetings from Jerusalem's mayor

It gives me the greatest pleasure to extend greetings to friends of Jerusalem all over the world on the occasion of Jerusalem Day. This is the day we commemorate the reunification of Jerusalem 34 years ago, a time of celebration for us all.

Jerusalem was only divided for 19 years of its 3,000-year history. It was always one city and it will always remain the united capital of the State of Israel and the Jewish people. We are the only people who have made this city our capital, and it has always been the centre of our prayers and our yearning.

I call upon all those who love Jerusalem to continue to show support at this crucial time in our history. In celebrating its unity, we must make every effort to ensure that the city is never again divided.

Stern weak in response

New York Knicks basketball player, Charlie Ward, was quoted as saying that Jews were responsible for the death of Jesus and that Jews persecute Christians every day. In defence of his blatant anti-Semitism when confronted by reporters, he stated that his best friend Jesus was Jewish. After being reprimanded by NBA Commissioner David Stern, he apologized. The reprimand and the apology in my view are insufficient.

Stern could have taken a lesson from major league baseball in the way it handled Atlanta reliever John Rocker and his racist comments by hitting him with a suspension. In the face of the popularity of the New York Knicks, Stern, a Jew, obviously lacked the courage to do so. He could still impose a significant fine, or better still, have Ward and some of the other Knicks who seemed to support his remarks participate in an educational and information program about race relations and anti-Semitism. I have written to Stern asking that that be done and I would urge your readers to do likewise.

Jerusalem Day 1967, in Nigeria

By ADINA ESHEL
Special to The CJN

In May 1967, as tension was building in the Middle East between Egypt and Israel, erupting eventually into the Six Day War, tension was also mounting in Nigeria, the most populated country in Africa.

Like most African states, Nigeria consists of many different tribes, often hostile to each other, artificially united into one huge state. The former colonial rulers – in this case Great Britain and France – had determined its boundaries, their loyal colonial clerks outlining borders on maps and conveniently overlooking the people living on that land, thus combining enemies and dividing homogeneous tribes.

Yoruba land, for instance, on which the predominant tribe in western Nigeria lived, had been divided between Nigeria, Niger and Dahomey (now Benin) – the first under British rule and the others under French rule, with borders in-between, so that one part of that tribe speaks English, the other French. The fate of who was to become what often depended on the thickness of the pencil the clerk used when marking the borders on the map.

Independent Nigeria as a whole had been divided into five administrative provinces, to which governors were appointed by the central government of the Federation of Nigeria. These provinces have since been divided into 36 "states."

Though independent since 1963, Nigerian tribal affiliations still mean much more to each tribe and tribesman than any national ideas or ideals.

That May, tension was building between the Eastern Province of Nigeria and the federal government over demands that were not met, and there was a threat that the province would secede from the federation and unilaterally declare itself an independent state.

My husband, two children and I were living in Nigeria at the time, in a residential suburb of Lagos, the former capital of the federation, located in the west. Ha'aretz daily newspaper in Tel Aviv, where I had worked in Israel, appointed me as a Nigeria and West Africa correspondent. I gladly accepted the appointment, as it would enable me to continue writing. I looked forward to writing about the newly independent African country and its newly independent neighbours.

At first, I sent in articles on a variety of subjects. All was so new to me – as to my readers – and the feedback I got from the editor encouraged me to continue. The more I became familiar with things in Nigeria, the more I realized I should be more careful and that I'd better stick to topics that had nothing to do with politics. So I restricted myself to areas of human interest or to topics such as, why do mosquitoes attack certain people, thus infecting them with malaria, and do not attack others? (It depends on whether a person's blood is "sweet" or "sour.") Or I wrote about the festive burial customs among African tribes. The real news was mentioned in private letters to the editor, with the request not to quote me or else…

When it became clear that the Eastern Province was heading for secession, and probably for war, my husband decided to inspect the eastern branches of the company he was in charge of while it was still possible.

Fearing that the east would also be physically cut off from the west were the bridge over the Niger River to be blown up, my husband, Menachem, decided to take us along. If cut off from Lagos, we would at least be together.

At the end of May 1967, we set out by car on our way to Enugu, capital of the Eastern Province. It was a long ride, and on our way, we were stopped several times by federal soldiers who politely made sure we were not smuggling Ibo men or arms.

The Ibos were the predominant tribe of eastern Nigeria. They referred to themselves as "the Jews of Nigeria," hinting perhaps at their having the largest rate of literacy in Nigeria, and better education, as well as Muslim animosity towards them. Most Ibos were Christians, the majority Catholic, some affiliated with the Church of England. Their opponents – in fact, enemies – were their northern neighbours, tribes of the Northern Province, most of them Muslims, headed by the Hausa tribe, who had taken over the federal government in Lagos after a bloody coup d'état.

After a long ride, we reached the Niger Bridge connecting western and eastern

The bridge[illegible] was now the Ibo soldiers' turn to stop and inspect us.

Driving slowly along the bridge, Menachem suddenly burst out laughing, pointing at packages lying along both sides of the bridge.

"That's dynamite," he said. "The problem with it is that it's on the wrong side. It should be underneath, not on top of it, if they really mean to blow it up."

After a few more inspections, we arrived safely in Enugu.

Early the following morning, May 30, we heard on the radio that the province had seceded from the Nigerian Federation and that the Niger Bridge had been blown up at night. All communications with the federation were cut off as well. So we were really cut off from home.

At 11 a.m., we approached the Eastern Province's governor's palace, where the governor was to declare the state's independence in a formal declaration. Well, we tried to approach, but the streets were crowded with hundreds, perhaps thousands, of people waving small flags and green branches of trees, singing and dancing. Happy faces and glittering eyes smiled at us, while people tried to draw us into their dancing circles.

"It reminds me of our first Independence Day," I said to Menachem, quite excited. "I'm so happy for them."

People were kind, allowing us to get closer to the square, where the declaration of independence was about to be heard. Someone handed me a few small pictures of General Odomegwe Odjukwu, the governor of the province, who was about to declare independence and become head of the new state. Below his picture were blown up letters saying: "Long Live Biafra." That is how we learned the new state's name.

I decided to keep the photographs for our Ibo employees in Lagos, if and when we managed to return there. I tucked them well into my purse, in case federal soldiers decided to inspect it. Then I went into a post office and mailed several postcards to Israel, to ensure having the "First Day of Independence" stamp. Later, I found out that none of the postcards ever reached its destination.

Listening to the declaration of independence of Biafra brought tears to my eyes – tears of happiness and of misgivings. I knew what was still in store for them before real independence was achieved, if at all. We left the square and set out on a tour, the whole time knowing nothing about the situation in Israel. We knew the Egyptians had blocked the Tiran Straits and that tension was mounting, but nothing more.

Our tour took us along roads, bush tracks, remote villages and jungles all over Biafra. Independence celebrations were everywhere, even in the remotest villages. It may have been before cell phones or even transistor radios existed, but the famous "bush telephone" proved as efficient as ever.

Arriving in Port Harcourt in the extreme south, we met other Israelis who were stranded in Biafra like us, unable to return to the federation, and like us, wondering what was going on back home. In the evenings, we gathered on the roof of our hotel to listen to the news on a portable radio, but we heard the BBC African Service quoting only Arab sources. According to them, all Arab states bordering on Israel had invaded it from all sides. Israel was clearly about to surrender. We even heard Kol Zion Lagola from Jerusalem (a special program for the Diaspora), but it said practically nothing about the ongoing war. It just played the new popular song Jerusalem of Gold repeatedly. It sounded to us like a prayer, and soon we were humming along.

While the British and American embassies in Lagos arranged for a way to evacuate their nationals from Biafra, we decided to return to Enugu and try to go by British airplane to Lagos. But on the way, we had a car accident. Though not our Nigerian chauffeur's fault, he had to remain in a small village police station, waiting for a higher rank police officer to free him, as well as to have the car repaired.

We decided to try and hitchhike. Eventually, a large black Rover passed us and after awhile, we heard it brake and reverse. Two white men were sitting in the car, quite obviously amused by the sight of two white adults and two young children standing in the middle of the bush, stretching out their arms for a lift – a most unlikely scene in those parts of the world at that time.

"Where is your car?" was their first question. They probably thought we had been robbed.

"Under repair," Menachem said.

They were headed for Enugu, so we got in the car, telling the kids in Hebrew where to sit.

Once we were settled, I said to the two men, "You are British, I assume."

"How did you know?" one of them laughed.

"By your car, of course, how else?" Their accent was so typically English you could not mistake it for anything else.

"I can't make out your nationality though," the man at the wheel said. He glanced at us in the mirror.

"We're from the Middle East," Menachem said.

"You're not Arabs, are you?" asked the other gentleman. "You don't have the right accent."

"We're Israelis," I said.

"What?!" the man driving exclaimed, in a very un-British manner, almost losing control of the car.

"Then you must be celebrating today," said the other.

"Celebrating what?" I asked.

"Your victory, of course."

"What victory?" Menachem and I asked together.

"You mean you haven't heard?" the man driving asked, all excited. "You have taken Jerusalem! The whole world knows!"

He tuned the car radio to the BBC. After a while the announcer confirmed that Israel had in fact taken the Old City of Jerusalem. In the middle of a jungle in the newborn state of Biafra, we were hearing the most wonderful news: Israel still existed and Jerusalem was ours.

Today, Biafra no longer exists and remains an almost forgotten episode. It did not survive the Muslim onslaught nor a cynical international attitude which preferred economical interests to justice and was clearly indifferent to human suffering. But I remember Biafra and I remember that Israel was not all that far from a similar fate.

By RABBI GUNTHER PLAUT

A future historian of our time who is concerned with the pace and politics of the Jewish community will surely deal with one subject: the conflict and/or competition between B'nai Brith Canada and Canadian Jewish Congress.

For those who are on the "inside," such tension is no secret. They know there are some issues on which the two organization clash, and others upon which they cooperate, but both are anxious to have the Jewish community appreciate their particular contribution to the welfare of the whole. They are eager to obtain the proper publicity and will attempt to have radio or television favour their particular role in certain issues.

Occasionally, this competition goes off the rails and produces quite embarrassing situations. Time and effort that could be utilized for the benefit of all are wasted, and in the end, they are not even a benefit to the organizations themselves. To be sure, egos are smoothed and protected, but there is a gap between what individuals want and what the community requires.

There is no national organization corresponding to Canadian Jewish Congress operating in the United States, so that the issue there is non-existent. Canada's Jewish community is much smaller and concentrated in Toronto and Montreal (half the Jews of Canada live in Toronto alone), so that any Canadian organization faces a fairly identifiable audience.

Of the two organizations, B'nai Brith is the older. Founded in 1842, it spread to North America and eventually to Canada as well, where from the beginning it had an important place in the fraternal structure of Jewish life. Canadian Jewish Congress, on the other hand, was founded in 1919. It made its entry into the public realm in the 1930s, peaked for a while, then disappeared from the centre of activity, but in the last few decades has occupied a central place of honour.

Congress often calls itself the "Parliament of Canadian Jewry," which is a noble concept but falls somewhat short of reality. I hope that its recent Plenary (held every three years) attracted the interest of a majority of Canadian Jews. But it is not an organization with memberships in which individuals have a stake, and as a roof organization, it is by its very nature more remote.

We are too small a number in Canada to fritter our energy away with useless antagonisms. There is much to do for all of us, whether as individuals or as organizations. But we will achieve something worthwhile only if we do it in co-operation with as many groups and institutions as possible. The question is not to whom belongs credit or blame. The question is, when will we come to our senses?

Tongue-tied

Jews are a people of many tongues. While Hebrew remained the Holy Tongue in which the Torah had been written, as well as the vehicle for written communication among far-flung and boisterously different language communities, Jews took on many languages and fashioned literatures and lives in them. Thus, to read a book on "Jewish literature" is an adventure into dozens of cultures.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

The Modern Jewish Canon by Prof. Ruth Wisse holds out great promises of defining what is (and is not) Jewish literature for our age. "Modern Jewish literature," she writes, "is the repository of modern Jewish experience. It is the most complete way of knowing the inner life of the Jews."

We owe Wisse a debt of gratitude for her achievement in introducing Yiddish literature into comparative literature courses, first at McGill University, and for her championing of Jewish literature – indeed, for her bold beginning in formulating what the modern Jewish canon may consist of, how one should approach the task of assembling it, and through what prism one should interpret its rich diversity.

Her definition of Jewish literature is succinct: "In Jewish literature the authors or characters know and let the readers know they are Jewish." She includes in her canon writers in many tongues. Beginning with Sholom Aleichem and his Tevye in Yiddish, through Russian, German, French, Polish and finally Hebrew and English, she chases the notion of what this definition actually includes and excludes.

However, her book has two voices. One is the literary critic, bringing formidable tools to probe the literature itself. The second is ideological, and it is here that the author seems at odds with her first goal. For what if the writer has impeccable credentials by her definition, yet writes a book filled with the nasty stuff of liberalism, which Wisse clearly identifies with the devil and all his works? Or writes in that language of destruction, German, as Franz Kafka did? Then we have a problem. As we progress through the book, it becomes clear that simply affirming one's Jewishness is not enough to make the grade. The deciding factor becomes the language in which one writes.

For instance: Wisse would have Kafka, who wrote in German, suffer mental anguish and "an adversarial relationship to his body," the "poisoned language affecting the body's health." I am more than uneasy with this. Can language carry such a burden? Is language itself the enemy?

Wisse goes further. Discussing Mr. Sammler's Planet by Saul Bellow, she asserts that Sammler "and his generation of liberal parents are implicated in the mess of their children's lives by failing to teach them discipline." The gloves come off in discussing "the hegemony of the liberal elites who sometimes control the democratic marketplace and try as viciously as repressive governments to silence and punish challengers." What Bellow does is "to champion, against the flood of self-indulgence, all the unpopular virtues: restraint, civility, wisdom, obedience to the law, familial responsibility, honesty, modestly and plain decency." All these, according to her, liberals lack.

This book was painful. What began as a clear indication of how we should seek to define a modern Jewish canon became a diatribe against the "left" and liberals in general. My worst moment of distaste occurred on page 236, where Wisse ends her chapter on the writers of the Shoah. About the East-Central Jewish writer in non-Jewish languages, she writes: "The suicides of [Paul] Celan, Jerzy Kosinski, Jean Amery and Primo Levi divulge the toll of writing about the destruction in Gentile tongues. Did their loneliness overtake them? Did they experience a common despair?"

In other words, Italian and French killed these people? No. What killed them was the murderous Nazi machine and its aftermath. Real life killed them. The assertion that languages have some life of their own, and are inimitable to Jews in their very essence, smacks of a different kind of racism, one which I cannot accept. Is writing in English, then, accepting the Jew-hatred of Frederick Charles Blair and his cohorts, and endangering us as we write? I think not. What is dangerous is the way that this book reflects the political ideology of the author, which has forced her to view with a distorted lens what she wanted to make so clear.

Re-assessing Yom Hashoah

Over the years, I have attended many Yom Hashoah (Holocaust Remembrance) services and programs. This Yom Hashoah, I was in Windsor. The service/program, organized by the Windsor Yom Hashoah Planning Committee and held at the Shaar Hashomayim Synagogue, was the equal of any that I have attended. It was ecumenical: it involved public figures – the mayor of Windsor read a civic proclamation; there was a moving keynote address by survivor Sam Offen; survivors, assisted by the youth of the community, led an emotional candlelighting ceremony; the haunting tones of Laura Condlin's viola filled the sanctuary; the kayle malei rachamim was chanted and the kaddish recited. It had all the ingredients of a big time event.

Bruce Elman in Windsor

Later, reflecting upon the evening, I realized that there was, in fact, a problem here: Yom Hashoah has become "big" – perhaps too big. We used to deprecate some Jews' synagogue "inattendance": "He's not a shul-goer. He only comes to shul three times a year."

What we meant by this, of course, was that the individual concerned could be found in shul only on Rosh Hashanah (2 days) and Yom Kippur (1 day). (Some question whether we can even say this anymore. Shuls are crowded now for only a few hours every High Holy Day season – perhaps an hour or two on Rosh Hashanah, Kol Nidre and Yizkor on Yom Kippur.) These days, however, we can say that many of these "infrequenters" come to synagogue "religiously" on Yom Hashoah. It is as if the Holocaust has become the central paradigm of Judaism.

Now, those individuals with even a little bit of a cheder education, will know that the central paradigm of Judaism is the series of events beginning with the redemption from Egypt, followed by the revelation at Sinai and culminating in the conquest of Eretz Yisrael as promised by God. The beauty of Judaism is embodied in the belief in God, the belonging to Kol Yisrael and the performance of the mitzvot. The Holocaust is not the central theme of Judaism and we should not treat it as if it is or should be. Holocaust education is important, but it is not, nor should it be, the essence of what it means to be a Jew.

On the Shabbat following Yom Hashoah, I was, once again, in attendance at Shaar Hashomayim Synagogue. The crowd was a fraction of the number it had been a week earlier. All of those teenagers who had participated in the Yom Hashoah candlelighting, what of them? Not one was in shul on that Shabbat. As my father-in-law says about synagogues: "If there are no children, there is no future!" As my former rabbi noted: "If you are going to bring your children to shul only a few times a year, do not bring them on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur [and I would add, Yom Hashoah]. Bring them to shul on Purim and on Simchat Torah [and Yom Ha'atzmaut – Israel Independence Day]. Let them see the joy of Judaism! Religiously (in both manner and persistence) commemorating the death and destruction of European Jewry will not ensure the continuity of the Jewish people."

Jack Wertheimer, the provost and professor of American Jewish history at the Jewish Theological Seminary, authored a very interesting article, called "Surrendering to Intermarriage," which appeared in the March 2001 issue of Commentary. In it, he quotes the usual intermarriage rate, derived initially from a 1990 Jewish population study, of between 43 and 52 percent – figures well-known to almost everyone who has an interest in such issues. More unnerving for me at least, is the data on "life after intermarriage": intermarried couples participate in the life of the Jewish community at far lower rates than non-intermarried couples; they are far less likely "to join synagogues or other Jewish organizations, to celebrate Jewish holidays, to enrol their children in programs of Jewish education, or to contribute to Jewish charities."

In a recent survey conducted by noted sociologist Steven M. Cohen and cited by Wertheimer, just 20 percent of intermarried Jews agreed with the statement: "I have a special responsibility to take care of Jews in need around the world." This is frightening to say the least!

We will not reverse this trend until we get back to the basics of Judaism – redemption, revelation, and Eretz Yisrael; believing in God, belonging to the Jewish people, behaving as a Jew by the observance of mitzvot. Ensuring that our children are in shul for Yom Hashoah when they are anywhere else but in shul on Shabbat will not help, and may well hinder, our ability to deal with the problem of intermarriage which undermines the continuity of the Jewish people.

The Kirshner File

Acceptance turned into rejection in Hungary

Hungary was a comparatively safe haven for Jews as the furious storms of the Holocaust lashed neighbouring countries like Poland and the Soviet Union.

Although Hungarian Jews were subjected to racial laws and discriminatory measures that rendered them second-class citizens, their physical security seemed assured. But with the German occupation of Hungary on March 19, 1944, all bets were suddenly off. Jews were isolated and ghettoized, then deported to Polish death camps. Within a few short months, two-thirds of Hungary's Jews were consigned to death by their fascist, pro-German government.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The Final Solution in Hungary, which claimed the lives of some 600,000 Jews, marked the brutal climax of a reactionary era in Hungarian politics that lasted approximately from 1919 to 1945.

A period marked by tribal nationalism, exclusion and anti-Semitism, it stood in sharp contrast to the previous four-decade, relatively liberal, epoch in which inclusion through assimilation had been the order of the day.

From the late 19th century to about 1918, Hungary was a model of tolerance. But in the aftermath of World War I, the situation changed radically as virulent nationalism inundated the country. Vera Ranki, a scholar of Hungarian origin, examines this phenomenon in The Politics of Inclusion and Exclusion: Jews and Nationalism in Hungary (Holmes & Meier). It is a major work that traces Hungary's ascent into modernity and its subsequent descent into barbarism.

During the 19th century, Hungary – an integral segment of the Habsburg Empire – was an agrarian society in which agriculture accounted for 90 percent of the gross national product. Being largely a nation of peasants, Hungary's future economic modernization hinged on the emergence of a strong middle-class. The Jews, among other minorities, filled that need. In time, they dominated the sugar, textile, food and heavy metal industries, pivotal sectors of the surging Hungarian economy. In recognition of their mercantile contributions, almost 100 Jews were ennobled.

The Magyars – the ethnic Hungarians who encouraged this trend – had another good reason to cultivate the Jews: the nationality question. Hungary, being a heterogeneous country, needed the Jews to ensure that the demographic balance of power would favour the indigenous Magyars.

Due to these imperatives, the Magyar aristocratic elite and the Jews formed an unwritten social contract. In exchange for their assistance in helping to establish a modern capitalistic economy and a Magyar-dominated nation state, Jews could expect complete emancipation, if not full acceptance.

Since Hungarian nationalism was then based on culture and language rather than on race and ethnicity, Jews had no problem with embracing this bargain. Much to the ire of Hungary's other minority groups, Jews took on the role of promoters of Hungarian nationalism.

Yet, as Ranki points out, Jews were never considered true members of Hungarian society. Although they assimilated with exemplary speed and thoroughness, and some even converted to Christianity, they were not viewed as genuine Hungarians, particularly by the working class and the peasantry. In any event, their political power remained marginal and random.

According to Ranki, the situation of Jews deteriorated drastically after World War I.

The 1919 "red" revolution, launched by the Jewish-born Bela Kun, prompted Hungarians of all classes to erroneously link Jews with communism. The alleged connection was continuously harped upon by Hungary's new ruler, Admiral Miklos Horthy, who ousted Kun in a counter-revolutionary coup. Within a year of his rise, Horthy introduced a numerus clausus law aimed at Jews. Regrettably, Ranki devotes exceedingly little space to the relationship between Kun's unsuccessful revolution and the upsurge of anti-Semitism.

The 1920 Treaty of Trianon – arguably the most painful event in Hungarian history – was also a factor in Hungary's lurch toward exclusionary politics. Under the terms of this draconian treaty, Hungary lost two-thirds of its territory – notably Transylvania and Fiume, its only sea port – and one-third of its population. Hungary's post-Trianon political culture turned nasty, unleashing a potent mix of chauvinism and anti-Semitism.

The position of Hungarian Jews was also undermined by the collapse of the Habsburg Empire and the concomitant flight of minorities from newly independent Hungary. Given these circumstances, Jews were no longer required as agents of Magyar dominance. More important, Magyars now clamoured to displace Jews from the ranks of the middle class.

With the fall of the Habsburg monarchy, Hungary became stridently anti-Semitic. The equality of Jews was increasingly questioned as the very concept of assimilation was attacked and rejected.

Rather acidly, Ranki comments: "Hannah Arendt wrote of German Jews that their 'relationship to Germany is one of unrequited love.' It was based on self-alienation, self-surrender and Jewish national negation. Arendt's description is true of Hungarian Jews after the decline of the monarchy."

Conversions to Christianity, nevertheless, continued apace. From 10,035 converts between 1896 and 1917, the number swelled to 30,774 between 1919 and 1938, and then declined to 16,049 from 1939 and 1942. It is estimated that about 100,000 such Jewish converts lived in Hungary when the Germans marched into Budapest in 1944.

Hungary institutionalized anti-Semitism by enacting three anti-Jewish laws from 1938 to 1941 and by forcing Jews into labour battalions. The legislation coincided with the return of pre-Trianon lands to Hungary. Was this a mere coincidence? Ranki thinks not.

The first anti-Semitic edict, borrowed from medieval guilds, was designed to limit Jews in the professions. The second affected lower middle-class Jews, while the third defined Jews by strict racial criteria. All these laws, however, contained provisions for exemptions.

Despite these edicts, Hungarian Jews remained patriotic and firm in their belief that they would survive the war more or less unscathed. They never imagined that their world would be uprooted by Nazi Germany and its local collaborators.

The chain of events that led to Germany's occupation of Hungary was set into motion by Hungary's efforts to find a way out of its alliance with Berlin. After Germany's crushing defeat at Stalingrad in 1943, Hungary scrambled to sue for peace. Alarmed by its overtures to the Allies, Germany invaded Hungary, thereby sealing the fate of its Jewish citizens.

At first, Hungary refused to surrender its Jewish citizens to Germany. The well-being of the economy was partially dependent upon Jewish industrialists, and Hungary valued its sovereignty. But once Hitler occupied it, Horthy placed the instruments of state at the disposal of Germany. Ranki accuses the Hungarian police, gendarmerie and civil service of collaborating with the SS in the Final Solution.

By then, the social contract that Hungarians and Jews had successfully forged during the halycon days of the Habsburg Empire had long dissolved and was but a distant memory.

Jews were sacrificed on the altar of rabid Hungarian nationalism.

Carl Lutz, a Swiss hero

Carl Lutz, to this day, remains a relatively obscure figure, notwithstanding his stellar achievement in saving Jews in Hungary. A Swiss diplomat posted in Budapest from 1942 to 1945, he is credited with rescuing 62,000 Jews from the clutches of the Nazis and their local collaborators. Yet, unlike Raoul Wallenberg, the Swede who saved some 100,000 Jews in Hungary, Lutz was almost forgotten after World War II.

Carl Lutz

Lutz, who served briefly as Swiss vice-consul in Palestine after the outbreak of the war, helped Jews by issuing so-called Schutzbriefe, letters of protection that kept them out of brutal labour battalions and prevented them from being arrested and deported. He was hard at work helping Jews even before the Holocaust reached Hungary. Tschuy claims that Lutz facilitated the emigration of approximately 10,000 Hungarian Jews prior to Germany's invasion of Hungary on March 19, 1944.

When Lutz returned to Switzerland after the war, he was reprimanded for having exceeded his authority. But with the passage of time, the Swiss government came to realize that his disobedience was really an act of heroism. In 1999, Switzerland issued a postage stamp in his honour, years after Yad Vashem had recognized Lutz – who died in 1975 – as a Righteous Gentile.

Now, thanks to Dangerous Diplomacy, Lutz's extraordinary feat has been inscribed for the ages.

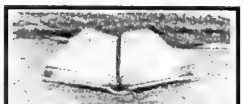
Lesson of the sabbatical year

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS

In Israel this year, the fulfilment of the first mitzvah in this week's parshah captures many of the emotions of the present state of the Land of Israel.

The Torah describes the mitzvah of shmittah, the sabbatical year. Just as there is a mitzvah of Shabbat on a weekly basis, there is a mitzvah of Shabbat for years. For six years, we are to work our fields, grow our crops and be creative in agricultural production. However, the seventh year is to be a sabbatical year to Hashem. We are not permitted to work the field, enhance the growing of the crops and be creative in our agricultural production. The land reverts back to its owner – the Master of the Universe. Anyone may enter my land and eat of the fruits that have grown by themselves – they can pick the grapes and enjoy them – for the grapes are ownerless, or at least have no earthly owner, only the Ultimate Owner.



Of course, if we think for a moment, this mitzvah is really hard to keep. If you have a contract with your employer that every seventh year you will get a paid sabbatical, then you have nothing to worry about – you'll get paid that seventh year and be free to pursue learning and other mitzvot unfettered by the need to work. But if I were to tell you that you had to take off the seventh year – but unpaid – that would be a bit tougher to do. How am I going to buy food, pay the rent, take care of the mortgage? What do we expect – that the money will fall from heaven? In fact, the Torah gives a guarantee that there will be extra blessing from above in the year preceding the sabbatical in order to help us through.

This mitzvah of shmittah, of the sabbatical year, is only applicable in the Land of Israel.

And herein, I think, is part of the present emotion of the Land of Israel. In Israel, they can live with uncertainty, with faith that things will work out, even if we don't work the land, that Hashem's hand is close, that miracles are daily occurrences. We, outside of the Land, we feel distant from Hashem, we would have trouble keeping a sabbatical year, so we suffice with a Shabbat, once a week.

My wife and I have just returned from a wonderful trip to Israel – the mood in the air is constantly animated by two conflicting moods – the real, which is a troubled mood, and the Divine, the walk with Hashem, which is confident and holy. The Torah in Israel is of a quality that is inspiring, deep, passionate and alive. Jews choose to plant themselves somewhere on that continuum stretching from the difficulties of the physical pressure to the clouds and inner contentment that the eyes of Hashem are watching over the Land.

This ultimately is the lesson of shmittah, of the sabbatical year. We work hard, but the success comes from above. We plant our crops, but the land belongs to the Master. We fight and worry for the Land – though the power of our connection to the Infinite, brings protection and peace.

Outside of the Land, the holy tries to infuse our physical lives – in the Land, the holy pervades and begrudgingly gives way to make room for the physical.

Israel: 'We loved every minute'

By RABBI ELYSE GOLDSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

I have been to Israel dozens of times, but this last trip – five short days on a rabbinic solidarity mission last week – was the most interesting, difficult, inspiring and disturbing, all at the same time.

Interesting, because for the first time, I was accompanied by nine other rabbis on a mission: not of politics, not of religious issues, but simply of tourism. In response to a guest appearance at the Toronto Board of Rabbis by Arie Shevy-Shibi, tourism director for Canada of the Israel Government Tourist Office, I had decided that in order for us to gain momentum and inspiration for congregational and organizational tours of our own, we needed to go ourselves, see with our own eyes, hear with our own ears.

In the space of just two weeks, four Reform and six Conservative rabbis had signed up to go, along with three spouses, for only one reason: as tourists, to show that we would not let "the situation" (as Israelis call it) deter us from supporting Eretz Yisrael. Left and right wing, male and female, Reform and Conservative rabbis would go together and see the sights, eat falafel, shop, laugh and just walk the streets of Jerusalem.

Difficult, because we quickly learned that everything in Israel is political. You cannot "simply" eat and drink together without politics and denominationalism coming up. But also incredibly inspiring, because ultimately, filled with goodwill and desire, we did cross all those lines and end up as one unified group of rabbis dedicated to the common good. We met with the left wing and the right wing and the middle. We met with Israeli rabbis and government officials and even tour guides with whom some in the group strongly agreed and some strongly disagreed, but we listened and asked and engaged in honest dialogue with each other and with our speakers. We all felt we had our ears and our minds and our hearts opened together. The Talmud says even the air of Jerusalem makes one wise. If we as rabbis hope for wisdom, this trip made us wiser about each other as much as about Israel.

And it was disturbing, because the city of Jerusalem was empty. The tourists are gone. Shopkeepers hang out in front of the stores on Ben Yehuda Street with nothing to do. I bought a beautiful large shofar from a store with a "going out of business" sign in the middle of the normally busiest part of the walking mall. I stopped in a shop with a hand-written sign on the window that read "Discounts for brave tourists." But nothing hit my heart like the beautifully decorated, coloured sign in the window of an exquisite Judaica shop which read: "Dear Visitor: We would like to thank you for your support by coming to Israel despite the situation. We hope that you enjoy your stay and hope to see you again, and God bless you."

Everywhere we went we were generously thanked for being there, and begged to come again. We heard time and again that Christian tourists are pouring into Israel while Jewish tourists cancel trips and stay away. We learned that 120,000 families are now affected by the tourism crisis. More hotels, restaurants, shops and little charming out-of-the-way places are closing every day. Our guide and bus driver (with a family to support) hadn't worked in eight months. Our first dinner was in an elegant hotel restaurant that opened specifically for us, because it hadn't served a dinner in six months.

Beside for Birthright and March of the Living, Jewish groups were noticeably absent. I sat in the plane in the middle of a large Mormon contingent. I'll never forget our closing dinner when after moving goodbye speeches, our group broke into spontaneous song and dance, and then the rest of the restaurant joined in with us. The owner told me it was the first joy he had felt in his place in a year.

Jerusalem was so quiet it was eerie. We stayed in tourist areas, travelled by tourist bus or taxis, stayed together and played it safe. We didn't go near Gaza, and in East Jerusalem we walked between two guards, which in and of itself felt strange but safe. Did we miss anything? Not a thing: we saw it all and loved every minute.

If anything good comes out of this tourism crisis, it is an odd benefit to the few tourists who do go: El Al service is outstanding (not the El Al I fondly remember of surly stewards, but a warm, friendly crew); shopkeepers now say hello and may I help you; Israelis on the street express gratefulness that you are there; hotels go out of their way with little extras and personal service; guides give you full attention, flexibility and enthusiasm.

My last group tour was eight years ago and it was a different Israel as far as service and quality went. We laughed about it then; it was a kind of "in joke" to "survive" a trip to Israel. It's not funny anymore and in this climate, everyone in Israel knows it and is willing to compete with the best of tourist places. And they succeed.

Would I go again, even with "the situation?" Definitely, despite the situation and because of the situation. I plan to take a group tour after the summer, as do most of the other rabbis who went on the mission, some as early as this fall. Surely if not now, then when?

Jewish Life

Shavuot – time for some dairy delights

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

From cholent to chicken soup, much of the Jewish gastronomic year seems to revolve around meat and poultry. But with the longer days and warmer temperatures of the Shavuot season, our palates turn to dairy foods. Today, some of the finest kosher dairy recipes on the Jewish Highway.

Shavuot is best known for the giving of the Torah, so why the association with dairy foods? Virtual Jerusalem lists seven reasons [207.168.91.4/vjholidays/shavuot/dairy.htm]. Two of the most famous: On Shavuot, the Jewish people received a new code of law, including the dietary restrictions that became part of their daily life. Since the new laws of separating meat and milk were still unclear, only dairy products were eaten on Shavuot to avoid transgressing against the unfamiliar laws. Another reason: The Torah is compared to milk, as it is written: "Sweetness drops/ From your lips, O bride; Honey and milk/ Are under your tongue." (Song of Songs, 4:11)

Let's start with some of the dairy classics. You can find recipes for blintzes (regular and low fat) at Beit HaChatulim [www.geocities.com/Heartland/Hills/1259/shvdairy.htm]. The Jewish-Food Blintz Archives has more than three dozen variations, including Asparagus and Cheese, Elaine's Bubbe's and Henny Youngman's [www.jewish-food.org/recipes/bliindex.htm]. (Take his cheese blintz, please?)

As for the other holiday staples, when I last checked, I found 16 cheesecakes and 19 varieties of kugel at the RFCJ Recipe Archives [www.cyber-kitchen.com/rfcj/category.cgi?category=SHAVUOT]. If you want to be more adventurous, check out this sites's large Shavuot recipe archives where you'll find out how to prepare Goat Cheese and Scallion Kugel, Carrot Vichyssoise with Orange Nectar and some good old Montreal Cheese Bagels.

Jewish Heritage Online Magazine has a lovely article that focuses on some lesser knownShavuot dairy foods [www.jhom.com/calendar/sivan/dairy.htm]. "Jewish women in oriental countries took pride in baking for Shavuot a seven-layer cake called Siete Cielos (Seven Heavens), symbolic of the traditional seven celestial spheres God traversed to present the Torah to Moses on Mount Sinai... Jews of Kurdistan prepare large quantities of butter and cheese for the festival. Their special dish was ground wheat cooked in sour milk with dumplings of butter and flour. In some communities, it was customary to serve matzah remaining from Passover as a reminder that Shavuot is the culmination of the exodus from Egypt. In North Africa the matzah was shredded into bowls of milk and honey."

Having a Jewish holiday focused on dairy may seem liberating, but not so if milk products make you ill. Merrell Candace Mastin is lactose intolerant and wanted to know how she should celebrate the holiday [aish.com/rabbi/ATR_browse.asp?l=d&offset=1]. The Aish HaTorah rabbi put it into perspective: "When all is said and done, eating dairy on Shavuot is only a custom, whereas 'enjoying yom tov' has the status of Torah law. So when the two ideas conflict, as in your case, it is better to preserve your enjoyment of the Shavuot holiday and not eat dairy. Of course, you could try soy milk as a substitute."

The recipes mentioned above are undeniably delicious. But I believe that the tastiest part of any holiday is its memories. I'm sure that Cyndi and her beloved Auntie Rivka would agree [www.empirekosher.com/shavuotblintzes.htm]. It seems that Cyndi's family had mouse problems in their home and decided to lay out some mousetraps. When Auntie Rivka dropped by to make some Shavuot blintzes, her niece quickly scooped the traps up and hid them in the freezer. When her aunt reached into the freezer to put away the cream cheese... well, the rest is family history.

And finally, if someone you know loves cheesecake but lives far away, you still can mail them a piece – via e-mail. Just go to Virtual Jerusalem, where you can send off an electronic postcard with a delicious photo of a virtual cheesecake along with a virtual blintz and a virtual boureka [207.168.91.4/vjholidays/shavuot/cheesecake.htm]. Sure, they'll never compare to the real thing. But at least the calories are virtual, too.

Inspiring collections: poetry, heroic tales

Books

Dungenessque*, by Ron Charach, Signature Editions, $12.95.

A poet recently said that for him words were like tools for digging. To extend the simile, language for Ron Charach has the tactility of a good toolkit.

A practicing psychiatrist and the author of six previous volumes of poetry, Charach deftly manages to combine psychological insight with dextrous word play.

Some of the poems in his new collection refer to matters oblique and personal, but most are readily accessible. They do not, however, reveal their full meaning in a flash of epiphany. A close second reading allows them to seep gradually into the reader's consciousness.

Jewish themes are prominent: a portrait of the poet's father, attending a lecture by the writer Aharon Appelfeld, the ambiguity of intermarriage, a ritual conversion, reading Irving Layton on the subway.

In Fancy Wedding, the poet writes, "Grown up, how many fewer might choose/ to marry outside the faith/ if granted the chance to marvel at/ the magic of the chupah canopy,/ the hand-painted ketubbah contract,/ the orbiting ritual, and the groom/ smashing a glass underfoot/ to remember the great ruined Temple?"

In Visitations, the poet is awakened from a reverie, first by a baseball team and then by a ballet troupe, each eager to train his children. He is informed that they practise on Friday night and perform on Saturday. He is then visited by a tall young rabbi who carried an enormous book. "I stammered, invited him in for a glayzeleh tay,/ I sensed he might be the prophet Elijah/ or some other Messianic geist./ But as I backed into the house/ my head was deep in uneasy sleep,/ and I was fading fast in the eyes/ of zealots who know where my family lives,/ and who always come to play."

Charach's voice is pliant and sonorous; sinuosity of thought flowers into deep and true feeling. This is an impressive and engaging collection.

The Light After The Dark II*, by Alvin Abram, AMA Graphics Inc., $23.95.

Alvin Abram is a superb storyteller. In this inspiring book he provides six true accounts of triumph by indomitable Jews when almost all hope was lost.

Young Joseph Morgenstern, on a train to Treblinka, forced his slender body through the bars of the death train. This harrowing experience was the beginning of a long uneven road to eventual freedom.

Escaping from the Germans, Jehoszua Cygelfarb found refuge with Czech partisans who put him in charge of a squad of wasted refugees and then rushed them into the battle for Bratislava. "Always we advanced, first crawling, then climbing, and running madly from obstacle to obstacle... in all this chaos, my men always moved forward screaming like mad men, their pent-up hate and anger urging them on." Astonishingly, still alive, Jehoszua watched the Germans withdraw from the city.

The survival of the Meisels twins of Vienna; the "Journey to Nowhere," of Michael Mayer and his Romanian family; the love story of Ibolya and Andy Reti told through letters from a desperate woman in Budapest to her murdered husband in a labour camp; the heroism of Avrom Feldberg confronting the Germans in the battle for the Warsaw Ghetto – all of these are heartrending and at the same time stirring and memorable accounts of victory over death.

Photographs of the survivors, who all eventually made their way to Canada, a helpful glossary and an up-to-date bibliography add interest and meaning to the book.

Plenary panel finds anti-Semitism thriving

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Is anti-Semitism back or did it never leave? Does it just look different?

A panel examining the phenomenon at last week's Canadian Jewish Congress plenary agreed that anti-Semitism has surged with a vengeance around the world thanks to the turmoil in the Middle East, the return of age-old canards and modern technology.

Because of fallout from the current Palestinian uprising, Arabs have adopted "a European style of anti-Semitism," Israel's deputy foreign minister, Rabbi Michael Melchior, told the well-attended session.

Across the Arab world, and in Egypt and Jordan especially, the media are using 19th-century anti-Semitic canards, Rabbi Melchior said. These include allegations that Jews are poisoning water and food supplies, and one report that Israel is spreading gas that induces gambling in Palestinians, he said.

Comparisons of Jews and Israel to the Third Reich, coupled with widespread Holocaust denial, are endemic in the Arab world, Rabbi Melchior noted.

According to World Jewish Congress executive director Elan Steinberg, there's a "retro-anti-Semitism" afoot, especially in Europe. In several nations, especially Poland and Russia, "traditional anti-Semitic lies" are being spread, and Jews should use the same tools today to fight the trend as they did in decades past. "The struggle is back," Steinberg said.

On the plus side, "attitudinal" anti-Semitism in the United States is way down, he stated, to the point where the vast majority of Americans had no problem with a Jewish vice-presidential candidate in the last election.

Anti-Semitism today is largely Muslim and intifadah-related, contended noted Mideast scholar Daniel Pipes. "The locus has moved from Christianity," he said, to among extremist Muslims, adding that the "new" anti-Semitism is "virulent, venomous and conspiratorial."

The Internet is proving to be fertile ground for neo-Nazis and modern anti-Semites, said Warren Kinsella, a former aide to Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and an expert on ties between contemporary far-right groups.

In 1995, there was one neo-Nazi Web site. Today, there are over 3,000, Kinsella said. He called the Internet a "cyber-sewer... the most significant boost to neo-Nazis ever."

But Canadians are reluctant to see the web regulated, he contended. Surveys have also shown that Canadians surf the web more than anyone in the world.

Far-right hatemongers have adopted "a kinder, gentler tone" online, a tactic that is sucking in increasingly more impressionable young people. He called a wide-open, unregulated Internet "a potential threat to democracy."

MP apologizes for 'Nazi' remarks

OTTAWA — Kitchener-area MP Andrew Telegdi has apologized to the House of Commons for comparing Canada's citizenship adjudication process to those under Nazi or Stalinist dictatorships.

"I had no intention to imply or suggest that our country or our judiciary is in any way to be compared with Nazis or Stalinism," Telegdi told the House. "I meant no offense to any group or individual. If my lack of clarity caused hurt or discomfort to them, I apologize."

Telegdi ignited a barrage of criticism when he came to the defence of former Nazi killing squad member Helmut Oberlander, saying Canada's citizenship removal process smacked of totalitarian abuse.

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) and the president of the Beth Jacob Synagogue in Kitchener were outraged at his remarks.

"Oberlander has been in the court system for six years. To suggest there is no due process is ridiculous," said Congress president Keith Landy.

"While Telegdi's statement in the Commons is a good beginning, we look forward to him apologizing to B'nai Brith Canada for misrepresenting our decades-long struggle to bring to justice those who have lied about their wartime past to gain entry and later citizenship to this country," said BBC president Rochelle Wilner.

Simon Adler, president of the Beth Jacob Synagogue, said he was shocked at Telegdi's remarks, saying the CJC was the only group that supported Oberlander's deportation.

"The whole idea behind these comments is Jews have too much power and are deliberately attacking Canada at large or some ethnic group in particular," he said, according to a report in the Kitchener-Waterloo Record.

Landy suggested Telegdi "got himself into hot water and took the way out the [Liberal] party offered him.

"But," he added, "one has to question why he's aligning himself with Oberlander."

Telegdi has argued that citizenship should only be revoked by the courts, not by a cabinet decision as is currently the case.

But in all cases involving alleged war criminals, including the Oberlander case, a trial is held in Federal Court to determine whether the defendant had misrepresented his wartime activities in order to gain admittance to Canada. The court's decision is subject to judicial review, as are the revocation and deportation procedures.

Telegdi concluded his remarks to parliament by repeating his view that "revocation of citizenship is a matter for the courts and not a matter for political decision."

Ronen's presidency ends, but not his activism

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Moshe Ronen, past national president of Canadian Jewish Congress, was installed at the last Plenary Assembly three years ago, delegates were told to fasten their seat belts and prepare for an activist three years.

"I can't say that it was because of me, but the issues and challenges that we faced and the way we dealt with them, certainly required all of us to fasten our seat belts," Ronen, 42, said in an interview before the recent 26th Plenary Assembly.

Ronen, Israeli born, is a lawyer, and the youngest president in CJC history. He began his community activities at age 16 as an active member of Betar, a Zionist youth movement.

As a university student he became involved locally in the Jewish Student Federation as well as the now defunct Network Canada, an activist Jewish students' organization. Eventually he became the first Canadian president of the North American Jewish Students' Network.

"Those were exciting times. I was given a New York office next to Edgar Bronfman in the offices of World Jewish Congress, and it was during the height of advocacy for Ethiopian and Soviet Jewry."

As he become more involved in student activities, he said, he began lobbying Canadian Jewish Congress to get the organization more actively pro-Israel and to get more involved in international Jewry.

He went on to become a national officer of CJC

"I ran for president of CJC in 1986 in order to raise the profile of students activities within Congress. Students made up eight percent of plenary delegates, so I expected to receive eight percent of the votes. I got 46 percent. It was both incredible and scary."

He went on to become a national officer of CJC, chair of the national executive, and chair of Ontario region, before becoming president.

As a child of Holocaust survivors, Ronen said, he feels "an obligation to work for the general welfare of the Jewish community. My parents always encouraged me and my brother Dan."

A highlight of his term and of his personal life, he said, was a trip he and his father Mordechai, took to Auschwitz with Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, at the prime minister's invitation.

"My father said to Chrétien, 'The last time I was here I came with my family by cattle car, and most of my family was murdered here. I am returning with my son, who is president of a Jewish organization, in the presence of the prime minister of my adopted country.'

"That says everything that I can ever say. It was a phenomenal achievement to be able to tell the prime minister about the Holocaust," said Ronen.

During his term, he said, Yom Hashoah became a statutory day in nine provinces, with a tenth – Saskatchewan – due to be passed in the fall.

"We relentlessly pressed government to ensure that judgements against Nazi war criminals are seen through successfully to the end, and we played a role nationally and internationally in ensuring that Canadian survivors had their rightful access to the various restitution funds."

Congress also played an important role internationally and nationally, he said, in pressing successor governments to accept responsibility for the crimes against humanity committed by their states in the previous century, and to provide appropriate redress to the victims.

Under his leadership, Ronen said, CJC's advocacy staff was moved to Ottawa, "one block from Parliament Hill. This gives staff members the opportunity to attend events on a daily basis, and MPs can drop in on us. All this helps to keep us on the radar screen."

He has maintained throughout his presidency that the community remain passionate and relentless in its advocacy on behalf of Israel, he said.

"I accompanied Mike Harris on a trip to Israel, and I took the opportunity to lobby him on issues related to Israel and such things as school funding. He still jokes about being lobbied for three straight days."

Moshe Ronen

As Ronen's term comes to a close, he said, "the natural thing is to remain committed and involved in the community. I've been involved for more than 25 years. It is part of who and what I am."

Although he always strived to make a lot of time for his wife and two children, ages 11 and 5, he will now have even more time to spend with them, Ronen said.

He plans on becoming actively involved in Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee, and he has taken on the position of chair of the board of governors of CJC.

"I intend to create a board of significant past senior officers who can advocate effectively both for Congress and its leadership, and for the community as a whole. The board will undertake certain projects that will advance the interests of Congress, such as the national Holocaust museum in Ottawa."

As well, Ronen said, he was appointed to the steering committee of the executive of World Jewish Congress, which is gearing up for its own plenary.

"I have enough to do," he said.

CORRECTION

Conflicting information about the number of Israel's fallen soldiers appeared in two recent articles about local Yom Hazikaron programs (CJN, May 3). In fact, 19,312 Israeli soldiers have been killed in battle since the country was established in 1948. The CJN regrets the error.

Marxist professor explores contemporary capitalism

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Leo Victor Panitch, a York University political science professor, has virtually devoted his 30-year career to understanding a system he would dearly like to replace.

"Most of my work as an academic has consisted of analyzing contemporary capitalism and understanding the nature of globalism," he explained.

Academia

Panitch, 55, is a Marxist, a proponent of scientific socialism, an economic and political philosophy that has profoundly affected modern society.

A New Leftist who believes in the primacy of economic determinants in history, he has written a panoply of books on his favourite topic, from Social Democracy and Industrial Militancy (based on his PhD thesis) to the forthcoming Renewing Socialism: Democracy, Strategy and Imagination.

Panitch, a Yiddishist, ascribes his fealty to socialism to his upbringing and to his maturation during the ferment of the 1960s.

He was born in north Winnipeg, a working-class district home to a left-wing Jewish community.

His father, Max, a furrier and Labour Zionist from the Ukraine, settled in Canada in 1922 at the age of 16. His grandfather, Yidel, was a watchmaker.

Panitch attended the Peretz school from kindergarten to grade 10, and there he perfected his fluent, idiomatic Yiddish. "Our teachers and principals were Yiddish intellectuals," he recalled.

As a student at the University of Manitoba and the London School of Economics and Political Science, he was caught up in the passionate debates swirling around nuclear disarmament and the Vietnam war.

By the time Carleton University hired him as a lecturer in 1972, he was a confirmed socialist. "The social science theory that made the most sense was Marxism. I became a Marxist despite the Soviet Union."

Like his father before him, Panitch rejected the "stultifying and authoritarian" Soviet model. Soviet and Chinese-style communism, he says, discredited socialism in the eyes of many people.

Although he votes for the NDP, he regards it as "another failure," a political party that has been co-opted by the system.

Like all Marxists, Panitch takes the long view, certain that a real socialist transformation will not take place in his lifetime.

"Capitalism will not pass away quickly. It took feudalism a millennium to vanish."

Yet Panitch, a fellow of the Royal Society of Canada, does not despair. "One tries to keep a socialist vision and analysis alive, and to create the possibility of a socialist alternative."

He added, "That's a very long process, but along the way, we hope for [political and economic] reforms."

The editor of The Socialist Register, published annually in London and New York, Panitch claims that Marxism better enables him to understand the past and the present.

Yet, as he readily conceded, it cannot help him divine the future. "Futurology is not knowledge. Marxism gives you a strategy, but you can't determine in advance what future conditions will be."

Leo Panitch

Panitch, who considers Canadian democracy "very restrictive," contends that socialism in Canada is extremely weak. "There is an enormous vacuum on the left here. But there is a a lot of talent on the left and a great deal of that talent is Jewish, from Naomi Klein to Judy Rebick."

In his view, the 1917 Bolshevik revolution tried but failed to eradicate anti-Semitism. "It was deeply ingrained in Russian society, and Stalin – a Russian nationalist – did not challenge it."

Nevertheless, he does not quite buy into the belief that state anti-Semitism was a feature of the Soviet Union after World War II. "Jews were represented in the professions on a disproportionate basis." He conceded, however, that Jews were all but purged from the Soviet diplomatic corps and the armed forces.

He described Birobidjan – the autonomous Jewish republic established by the Soviet government in eastern Siberia in 1928 as an alternative to Zionism – as a fiasco. "It failed completely."

Panitch, who has visited Israel once, supports a two-state solution to resolve Israel's conflict with the Palestinians. "The occupation [of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip] has been a curse on Israel, and Israel's settlement policy there has been criminal."

He is broadly sympathetic to the right of Palestinian refugees to return to their former homes in what is now Israel. "But is it practical? That's a different question."

A secular Jew who observes major Jewish holidays, enjoys listening to cantorial records and contributes articles to Canadian Jewish Outlook, Panitch is married to Melanie Pollock of Winnipeg.

Pollock is the director of the School of Disability Studies at Ryerson Polytechnic University.

They have two children, Maxim, 25, and Vida, 23.

Come the summer, he and his son plan to travel to their ancestral roots in Ukraine. Call it a sentimental journey.

Levy brings Sephardi music to life in Toronto

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For over 30 years, Solly Levy has been bringing Sephardi culture to life in Montreal.

In Quebec, Levy has received many awards for his "exceptional contributions to the artistic dimension of the Sephardi identity" as well as for the cultural advancement of the Jewish community.

This past year, Levy moved to Toronto. One of his first projects here has been to capture and record the piyyutim (liturgical poems) of northern Morocco.

"Historically, there have been poets, often rabbanim, who loved writing," Levy said in an interview.

Sometimes the spiritual content of their poetry was so elevated, Levy explained, that many kehillot decided to integrate their piyyutim into their services.

In the Sephardi tradition, these piyyutim would often become a part of the service – to the point that you couldn't imagine holidays such as Rosh Hashanah or Yom Kippur without pizmonim (liturgical hymns) by 11th-century rabbanim such as Yehudah Halevy or Shlomo Ibn Gabirol.

Over the course of the centuries, Levy noted, many rabbanim wrote liturgical, mystical poetry. But not all of them were included in services – the others were collected into books of Moroccan piyyutim.

When these poems were set to music, the melodies were often taken from the community's cultural surroundings. In Morocco, melodies for the poems were taken from both folk and popular music as well as the more classical Arabic Andalusian tradition. Andalusia is a region in southwest Spain.

Andalusian orchestras consist of as many as 75 instruments – such as ouds, violins, percussion, oriental citars and tambourines. However, the music can also be played by smaller bands, Levy said.

In the Middle Ages, bands were formed by Jews and Muslims in Spain. After the Expulsion and many difficult years, Jews and Muslims renewed the tradition of singing and playing together in North Africa.

While the art of the piyyut is not only restricted to Morocco, Levy believes that it flourished more abundantly in Morocco than in other countries.

It became an oral tradition that was passed from one musician to another, Levy explained. These musicians became known as paytanim.

"Even though the pieces were very well structured, the music wasn't transcribed into notation for many years. There were no scores," Levy said.

Today, prominent paytanim – including Sammy Anzalog, Haim Luk, Jo Amar, David Buzaglo and Emil Zrihan – have carefully researched and recorded many Moroccan piyyutim.

However, the pizmonim that are unique to the Tangiers area in northern Morocco have never been recorded, Levy said. Working together with ethnomusicologist Judith Cohen, Levy is hoping to organize and record the piyyutim from this area.

Many of the chazzanim familiar with this style are getting older and dying and this part of our heritage could be lost, Levy said.

Solly Levy and the Hallel ve Zimra Choir.

"We are losing the differences in style and pronunciation because of the influences of other cultures.

"It is difficult for me to tolerate and accept the end of something. If I can do something, even a small token of an action to preserve our traditions – I will do it."

Levy will be conducting the Sephardic Kehila Centre's Hallel ve Zimra Choir, which he founded, for the opening of a gala concert featuring Emil Zrihan and the Israeli Andalusian Orchestra of Ashdod.

The event on June 12th, in celebration of the 25th anniversary of the Or HaEmet Sephardic School, will take place at the Toronto Centre for the Performing Arts. For further information, call 905-669-7654, ext. 232.

CHAT student wins Brandeis scholarship

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Gila Ashtor's poetry has appeared in 35 anthologies and in her own book published by an American company. She writes a monthly column in The Canadian Jewish News, and is involved in just about every school activity offered at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) – all while maintaining an average of over 90 percent.

Gila Ashtor

It's not surprising, then, that the energetic 18-year-old – who spends her spare time on projects like the school yearbook, school newspaper, an annual basketball tournament and, most recently, writing and producing a one-hour Yom Hashoah ceremony – is among an elite group from around the world to be awarded a full scholarship to Brandeis University.

Of more than 1,000 applicants this year, only five received the Wien International Scholarship, which amounts to approximately $58,000 (Canadian) per year for four years, covering tuition, residence, food and personal expenses. (About one-fifth of the amount is a loan, forgivable if Ashtor returns to Canada following her studies.)

Had she known how stiff the competition would be, she "never would have applied," said Ashtor at her kitchen table, near a cluster of congratulatory helium-filled mylar balloons bearing her name.

She was encouraged to apply for the scholarship by Brandeis' associate director of admissions, Nicholas Senecal, when he visited Toronto, and by Rabbi Howard Sacknovitz, CHAT's director of guidance. Rabbi Sacknovitz confirmed recently that there are at least three other graduating CHAT students who have won prestigious university scholarships.

What appealed to Ashtor about the relatively small (3,800-student) Waltham, Mass. campus was its similarity to her current school. "It's like a bigger CHAT," she said of the only Jewish-sponsored, non-sectarian, secular university in this hemisphere, as it is described in the Hillel Guide to Jewish Life on Campus.

"While I probably would have been happy [elsewhere], I think there is something very unique about the CHAT experience. The more I'm involved in it, the more I love it. It's not just a school. It's a way of life."

CHAT has over 1,500 kids representing a range of Jewish backgrounds, she noted, "but they do pull together… We practise tolerance by example."

Ashtor applied to half a dozen universities, but Brandeis was the only American one, mainly because of the prohibitive cost.

Although she hasn't decided on a career just yet, Ashtor is very interested in psychology. "I love to know the way people think. That fascinates me," she said.

She described the application process she went through as "brutal." She collected more than 14 reference letters, for example, although she was only required to supply three.

Among the most profound influences in her life was her father Alex, who died of cancer when she was a 12-year-old student at Associated Hebrew Schools. He told her it didn't matter what career she eventually chose unless she was a decent human being, she recalls.

Having also lost an older brother in a car accident, Ashtor said that she thinks about herself not as having experienced so much tragedy – as others sometimes tell her – but rather as having learned so much about life.

The lessons are evident in her poetry, arranged in chronological order in her book, Silver Lining.

Religious language said not conducive to peace

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel's haredi population seems ideologically and theologically incapable of making the concessions necessary for peace, says the executive director and counsel of the Israel Religious Action Centre (IRAC).

"The minute the Camp David talks suggested further territorial concessions, they jumped ship," said Rabbi Uri Regev at a recent talk sponsored by ARZA Canada, Temple Kol Ami and Canadian Friends of Peace Now.

IRAC, the social action arm of the Israel Movement for Progressive Judaism, is the leading advocacy group in Israel promoting religious pluralism, social justice and human equality.

Rabbi Regev, a founding member of Betzelem, the organization monitoring human rights in the occupied territories, led battles in which he and IRAC's legal team achieved victories in the Supreme Court of Israel in cases involving the Who is a Jew issue, the fight for equitable funding for Reform and Conservative institutions, and on other central issues of religion and state in Israel.

He said that although Israeli public school texts talk about both the Oslo Accords and the fact that Jerusalem is a holy place for three religions, "none of that is integrated into the haredi educational system.

"There is not a word about the peace process, or about Jerusalem being holy to anyone but the Jews," he said.

The new Palestinian textbooks discuss religious tolerance, but they mean religious tolerance between Christians and Muslims, not between Jews and Muslims, he said. "There is not a good word about Jews or Judaism, and there is no Israel in the new texts."

It is clear that whether we are talking about Palestinians or Jews, he said, there is no religious language that is conducive to peace.

There is a relationship between the issues of religious pluralism and peaceful co-existence, he said. "Somehow there is a sense that the peace camp is not interested in religion, and the religious camp is not interested to the extent that some would have liked, in the cause of peace.

"I think it represents a misperception to a great degree on the part of both camps," he said.

"We have not paid enough attention to the founding vision of Israel as a Jewish state. We have not recognized that it is a commitment [towards] a society that is rooted in the principle of equality," said Rabbi Regev.

In 1947, David Ben-Gurion said that in the Jewish state, a Jew will not have any right that is not also granted to a non-Jew if he is a resident of the state, he said.

"In these 53 years, however, the vision…laid down in his blueprint have not quite been carried out. There has been progress in terms of allocations of resources to Arabs, but there are still Arab towns with no running water or electricity, and no health and welfare. We still have a long way to go."

For Ben-Gurion, said Rabbi Regev, equality was an extension of his vision of a Jewish state.

Israel set out to be a Jewish state, said the rabbi, but there is now in Israel a debate waging "in the scholarly world, amongst politicians and in the general public, about what a Jewish state is. For some, it is clear that a Jewish state is a theocracy. This is the guiding principle shared by most Orthodox establishments from moderate Orthodox to haredi."

The notion of the Jewish state, however, is a unique mixture of liberty, justice, peace, and a commitment to equality that overrides racial, gender and religious differences.

"It is in all our interests to see that Israel endorses Jewish diversity and empowers Jewish voices such as those of the Reform movement," said Rabbi Regev.

Day's CJC speech brings plaudits, trouble

Day rose in the House of Commons on Friday to state: "The Canadian Alliance supports the right of the State of Israel to exist within safe and secure borders, and the right of Palestinian people to negotiate for self-government through the peace process. We condemn any terrorism on any side of this complicated conflict.

"I want to assure all Canadians that this remains my position, the position of our party, and reflects my speech earlier this week."

Day also wrote a letter to the National Council of Canada-Arab Relations, but stopped short of an apology – the only thing the council says would preclude a lawsuit against Day.

CJC was quick with a defence for Day.

Legal threats against the Opposition leader are "an attempt to put a chill in those politicians who feel unconstrained about voicing their honestly held views," said CJC president Keith Landy. "It's unfortunate that Day even went so far as to seemingly back off from his earlier statement. He had nothing to apologize for."

And if Day is sued, "we'll do our best to ensure he has the best legal counsel."

Jewish officials were thrilled at Day's hard-hitting 30-minute speech on May 7, which was supportive of Israel beyond anyone's expectations.

Referring to mortar attacks against Israeli targets, Day said to applause: "It is certainly not plausible that these attacks are occurring without at least the knowledge or the tacit approval of some in the Palestinian police and their superiors. These are facts.

"We know," he continued, "that paramilitary organizations, including the Hezbollah, Hamas and Arafat's own militia, the Tanzim, continue to train and participate in attacks, not against Israeli military forces, but against Israeli civilian targets, and even against dissident Palestinians themselves."

There is "a moral difference between an accidental injury or death of bystanders who are tragically caught in the crossfire of violence, and the deliberate murder of innocent people in a premeditated act of terrorism," he said to spirited applause.

Day also slammed media coverage of the conflict.

"It's easy to watch through through the eye of the camera the consistent portrayal of modern tanks versus ancient slingshots. Is that an accurate image?"

Oversimplified conclusions about the conflict often form the basis for Canadian foreign policy, which Day condemned for being made behind closed doors.

Policies are "often not [based] on the facts of what's happening on the ground, but too often, the federal government bases its approach on a perception and sometimes on a 'groupthink,' and perhaps not on reality.

"There is something seriously wrong and seriously missing from Canadian foreign policy, and that failure is a real lack of full and honest public discussion, public involvement and public debate.

"Your issues are far more important than to be dealt with in such an abbreviated fashion."

He blasted Palestinians for violating an agreement to restrict the number of their police officers to 30,000. Palestinians "openly boast" of a police force "of over 40,000."

He also slammed the Palestinian leadership for failing to protect holy sites. The sacking of Joseph's Tomb in Nablus last fall "was a troubling signal that somebody was not fulfilling their side of the agreement."

Last fall, Day blasted Canada's support of United Nations Resolution 1322 as unbalanced and one-sided. At the plenary, he said Canada has since supported "literally dozens of resolutions which many of you feel are blatantly anti-Israel. And Canadians never get to hear about it."

These resolutions "pre-judge the outcome of negotiations."

He also called on Ottawa to verify that aid to Palestinians is "not being siphoned off" to fuel hatred and tensions.

Israel "needs the support of friends," Day said, and Canada "has the ability and potential to be a neutral, honest broker, and that can only happen if these things are discussed in a neutral arena and in an honest way."

Canada's deputy prime minister, Herb Gray, blasted Day's "completely inaccurate statements," and denied Canada has been unfriendly toward Israel.

"Canada has not adopted an anti-Israeli policy," he told reporters. "It continues to be a strong supporter of Israel and it is working for peace in the Middle East.

"Mr. Day is wrong in this, like he is in so many other things."

Day's address also contributed to the mutinous turmoil within his own party and caucus.

For many in the Alliance, the speech was a sharp shift from the party's traditional support for a negotiated settlement without apportioning blame.

Monte Solberg, the party's foreign affairs critic, said as "an important courtesy," he should have been informed about the speech because it didn't reflect party policy.

"You'll never get people to agree on who is responsible for what or who's at fault. So I think it's better to talk about the processes that can move the thing forward.

"Let's just hope this is another anomaly," said Solberg, adding he didn't think Day would be making more speeches on the Middle East "any time soon."

Keith Martin, the party's House Leader, said that from now, Day's speeches will be vetted by the appropriate critic.

Opposition parties condemn announcement

"Any time you have a government telling you they're prepared to do something, then it's an obvious sign something has gotten through to them. It's a sign the efforts of the community have made an impact."

Radio call-in shows and editorial pages last week were radiant with opinions that the move will benefit the rich and siphon millions from a cash-starved public system. Opposition Liberals and New Democrats condemned the announcement in similar terms, warning of two-tiered education.

Liberal leader Dalton McGuinty called the measure the first step toward a voucher system, and vowed to fight it "tooth and nail."

But Flaherty said most students in private education are in religious and ethnic schools and not upper-crust institutions that cater to the wealthy.

"Students who attend these schools are from working families, middle-class and lower income families. This is about more money for children; it's about more choice for parents who value the cultural and religious traditions which they cherish in their own communities."

Later, he told reporters that independent schools "serve a purpose for many of our communities, for our cultural and religious communities, in Islam, in the Jewish community, in the Christian schools."

Georgeanne Burke of Jewish Parents for Equality in Education Funding (JPEEF) said the move is "an opportunity to show that this will work and not be harmful to public schools." The government, she said, is also acknowledging that not all parents of children in private schools are wealthy.

"We're not rich. We're regular people like everyone else."

Meantime, members of the recently formed umbrella group, Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools (OAJDS), will meet in the coming weeks to study the measure, said president Yisroel Janowski.

Rather than altering the group's mandate, the development will mean "we will get busier than ever," Janowski said. "Our second phase [after securing funding] was to be at the table to represent the schools."

In all, Ontario's initiative is "comparable" to the situation of private and independent schools in other provinces, said CJC's Rosenblum. But, he added, in Ontario, "Catholics still get 100 percent [of tuition publicly funded]. That's where Ontario is still unique."

Seymour Epstein, executive director of the UJA FEDERATION Board of Jewish Education, said he's "personally disturbed" at widespread rumblings that the measure is an attack on the public school system.

Similar tax breaks and funding measures have taken place in other provinces, "and nothing has happened to the public system. Ontario is just growing up."

Toronto financial consultant honoured

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – Sonny Goldstein, founder of Goldstein Financial Consultants, was recently presented with The Servitium, Nobilitas et Generositas Award by the Canadian Association of Insurance and Financial Advisors, Toronto Chapter (CAIFA).

The presentation was made at a Cystic Fibrosis Foundation fund-raising dinner during the 2001 Congress of Ontario Insurance and Financial Advisors meetings at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre.

Established in 1994, the award has since been bestowed on three recipients "to recognize exceptional members of the association for outstanding service and leadership within the insurance and financial services industry."

The recipient, from the greater Toronto area, must demonstrate an exceptional level of achievement and commitment to the industry and to the community.

"I received this honor along with the late David Cowper, Sr. – this makes it even more special," Goldstein said. "David was a legend in the industry and contributed much to the country. A real mentsch.

"It is wonderful to be recognized by my peers for the community work that I so much enjoy."

Born in Toronto and raised in Ingersoll, Ontario, Goldstein attended the University of Toronto. He has worked in the insurance industry for 35 years, and in 1995 established Care For Kids, a charitable foundation which raises funds for the Palliative Care Program at Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children.

Goldstein entered the insurance business in 1966, and in 1974, qualified for the Million Dollar Round Table, an honour given to those in the industry who sell a certain amount of insurance. Over the years, he became a life and qualifying member, achieved Court of the Table six times and received the National Quality Award 16 times.

In 1991, he served as president of the Life Underwriters Association of Toronto (now CAIFA Toronto), and was active on the national level.

A speaker and writer, he writes for several trade publications, is heard on radio, and is featured six days a week on his own CHIN radio spot titled Managing Your Money With Sonny Goldstein.

Goldstein is also on the executive of the 65 Roses Sports Club, a fund-raising arm of the Cystic Fibrosis Foundation.

In 1998, as head of Goldstein Financial Consultants, an independent financial planning practice, he purchased a 50 percent interest in his own Mutual Funds Dealership, Goldstein Snider Investments Inc. The company serves more than 4,000 clients and looks after some $200 million in investments.

An avid sports fan, a photography buff and a golfer, Goldstein is on the executive board of Beth Tikvah Congregation. He and his wife Edie have three daughters.

Student energy belies reports of apathy

By LARA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The room was packed. The energy level was palpable. Yet Jewish student leaders from across Canada – panelists at a session titled Issues Facing Jewish Students at the Canadian Jewish Congress Plenary Assembly on May 6 – claimed that one of the largest problems facing Jewish students is apathy.

CJC Plenary

Although universities such as York, Dalhousie, Western and Concordia have large Jewish populations, attendance at most Jewish programs remains low, the five panelists said, suggesting that Jewish students across Canada are largely uninvolved with Jewish causes and events.

"The majority [of Jewish students] are apathetic" even at York University, which has the largest percentage of Jews in a Canadian university, said Sandra Ziskind, a recent graduate of Osgoode Hall Law School and an active member of the Jewish Student Federation.

"Apathy is a wide-ranging disease that is easy to succumb to," argued Barbara Zeller, recent graduate of the University of Toronto, and, beginning in the fall, a law student. Creating excuses is "ridiculous," she said. "Find the time to do the things that you care about."

"The problem of attendance at events is not unique to the Maritimes," said Leigh Lampert, an MBA and law student at Dalhousie University and president of the Canadian Jewish Law Students Association. "It's difficult to get people to come out, and the question becomes, how do you do that?"

One of the reasons for low attendance, Lampert suggested, is a lack of resources. "A lot of people... especially, from Toronto... aren't aware of what happens in the smaller Jewish communities and the situations that exist."

Incoming president of the Jewish Student Union at the University of Western Ontario, Josh Chuval, corroborated, indicating that there is a "serious lack of funding in London... We're still looking for a few people... [who are] willing to provide us with the means in order for us to do our outreach."

The panelists had other explanations for the lack of interest in Jewish programs on campus; many noted that the current Mideast crisis is a point of contention on some campuses, and as such, reason to disssociate from Jewish or Zionist events. Ziskind claimed some students are "embarrassed" about Israel and therefore become detached from Jewish causes.

According to most of the panelists, the situation in Israel was another large issue facing Jewish students on campuses across Canada this year. Avi Finegold, co-president of Hillel at Concordia University, said that his university "was one of the most volatile campuses in North America in terms of the Arab-Israeli conflict."

Other universities such as Dalhousie and Western have also been confronted with Arab-Jewish problems and anti-Semitism on campus. Panelist Michael Jankelowitz of the Jewish Agency for Israel in Jerusalem stated: "Students... have got to be prepared" to face the reverberations of the Mideast crisis on campus.

"The only way to correct stereotyping is through inter-cultural programs that push awareness," Zeller argued.

Using the metaphor of the "tossed salad" that represents Canadian society, she suggested we encourage our multiculturalism and not become segregated like a "compartmentalized lunch box."

Questions and comments flew rapid-fire as soon as the discussion was opened to the multi-denominational audience of students and non-students. Strong applause followed the statement made by Beth Suraski, former president of the University of Waterloo and Wilfred Laurier Jewish Student Association (1997-2000).

"We're the leadership," Suraski said. "Even if ten people show up to a program...take those people and show them a good time... get them Jewishly excited. We have to get them doing Jewish. Next thing you know, they tell ten people, [and] there's a hundred people coming out... There's a lot of positive things to say" about small Jewish communities, noting that Waterloo was recently granted a house and a staff member.

"Students have to fight for those things."

The audience also advised other approaches. Some suggested open-minded programs that are more inclusive to a wide range of political beliefs. Eddie Shostak, president of McGill Hillel, suggested that exciting and diverse programming is key to attracting more students. He described successful Jewish programs in Montreal such as the annual Purim party, which this year drew a crowd of almost 1,500 young adults, and a luncheon for management students and local businessmen and women.

David Silverberg, one of the panelists and a Ryerson Journalism student who is the associate editor of the Canadian Jewish student newspaper, Afterword, recommended a re-vamping of the image of Jewish organizations "to make them more human" and therefore more attractive to students.

After the session, Prof. Irwin Cotler, Member of Parliament and former president of the Canadian Jewish Congress, praised all the students.

"I was very impressed," he said. "I have been encouraged by this session. I would like to commend them for their involvement, for their initiative, for their courage. And I think this bodes well for the Jewish future."

Blintzes & other Shavuot traditions

BY RIVKA TAL
Special to The CJN

In Israel, Shavuot, the holiday commemorating the giving of the Torah to the Jewish people on Mt. Sinai, is accompanied by all-night Torah study marathons.

Houses are decorated with boughs of green and fresh cut flowers, bringing to mind the transformation of Mt. Sinai into a veritable garden. Children dress in white, and the usual heavy holiday meat-laden meals are generally replaced by lighter, dairy fare.

There are several reasons for the custom of eating dairy foods on Shavuot. One is that until the giving of the Torah, Jews were permitted to eat the meat of any animals, including those that had not been slaughtered in accordance with the laws of ritual slaughtering.

These laws, as well as those of ritual slaughter were given to the Jewish people at Mt. Sinai on Shavuot, and all dishes became unkosher and could not be used until they were koshered. Dairy foods were the answer. The Torah has been compared to milk and honey, and this, too, has been cited as a reason for the day of milchige dishes.

The word blintzes seems to almost automatically follow mention of the holiday of Shavuot. I can picture my mother preparing the blintz wrappers one by one in a small frying pan, then knocking them out to cool on a clean white dish towel on the kitchen table.

But other communities have their own unique Shavuot traditions, and the older Israeli population still keeps up these traditions from their countries' of origin. In Iraq and Afghanistan, Shavuot was called the Holiday of Roses. Children would scatter rosebuds onto the Torah scroll as it came out of the ark. In Libya, children were given seven leaves from a plant symbolizing the burning bush.

The Jews of Aden would bake a special cake from coconut, almonds and honey, while Persian Jews prepared a cake from rice and walnuts for the holiday. Yemenite Jews eat potato fritters, while many Jews from the Far East eat rice and milk.

Jews from some Sephardi communities bake a challah with seven columns, symbolizing the seven weeks between Passover and Shavuot. Kurdistan Jews eat a wheat cereal with leben (a cultured milk product) and cheese-filled fritters on Shavuot, while many Jews hailing from Afghanistan cook rice and serve it with butter and yogurt.

My friend Miriam was born in Casablanca. Her Shavuot specialty is dairy couscous. While couscous, prepared from semolina, a coarsely ground durum wheat, is usually served with an elaborate combination of chicken or beef, zucchini, winter squash and chick peas, on Shavuot she prepares couscous with milk and butter.

She says that her children and grandchildren look forward to it all year. While she prepares the real thing, steaming the grains with a couscoussiere, then rubbing with her hands to separate and fluff the grains, we lesser mortals might take a shortcut, using the readily available quick-cooking couscous.

COUSCOUS

2 cups boiling water or vegetable broth
1½ cups quick-cooking couscous
1½ tbsp. butter
½ cup slivered almonds
¼ cup golden raisins
2 tbsp. sugar
⅛ tsp. ground cinnamon

Blueberry blintzes for Shavuot.

salt to taste
dash ground cloves
butter, milk, sour cream, sugar to pass

Pour boiling water over couscous in a bowl. Cover and let steam for 20-30 minutes. Uncover and break up any clumps with your fingers. Melt butter in a large skillet. Add almonds and raisins and saute for a few seconds.

Add couscous, sugar, cinnamon, cloves and salt; saute for a minute or until all of the ingredients are hot. Serve individual portions; pass softened butter, milk, sour cream and sugar. Yield: 8 servings.

CHEESE AND SPINACH BOUREKAS

1½ kilo frozen puff pastry
1 pack of spinach (1½ lb.)
½ lb. ricotta or mild feta cheese
1 heaping tsp. sifted flour pinch of salt
1 egg yolk, beaten
½ cup sesame seeds

Remove puff pastry from freezer 1 to 2 hours before beginning. Stem spinach. Wash in water, lifting and shaking to dislodge sand. Repeat until completely sand-free. Shake to remove excess water. Steam with no additional water for 5-7 minutes, until wilted. Drain very well and chop finely in food processor. Strain off any excess water.

Combine spinach with cheese, flour, and salt. Preheat oven to 350. Unroll pastry and place on lightly floured surface. Roll out. Cut out circles using a glass. Place a heaping tsp. of mixture in centre of each circle and fold each circle in half.

Brush with egg yolk and sprinkle with sesame seeds. Place on a parchment paper-lined baking tray. Bake for about 35 minutes, or until golden brown. Yield: about 48 bourekas. Note: 1 10-oz. package of frozen minced spinach may be substituted for fresh spinach.

TARATOR SOUP

4 6-in. cucumbers, peeled and coarsely chopped
1 garlic clove, minced
4 cups unflavoured yogurt
½ cup water
½ tsp. salt
2 tbsp. chopped fresh dill
3 tbsp. snipped chives

Puree cucumber and garlic in a blender. Add yogurt, water, salt and dill and mix well. Refrigerate at least 2 hours.

When ready to serve, ladle into bowls and sprinkle with snipped chives.

Can't get to sleep? Then get up, doctors recommend

By BEN ROSE
Special to CJN

TORONTO — Don't raid the refrigerator if you can't sleep. Instead, get up and knit or do some paper work until you get drowsy again.

This was the advice given 45 seniors at a forum on sleep disorders by two doctors from the Metropolitan Toronto Sleep Disorders Centre, sponsored recently by the 55 plus department of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre.

Get up at the same time every day, and don't sleep in, even if you lost two hours during the night, advised Dr. Jeffrey Lipsitz, the centre's executive director, and Dr. Jaan Reitav, a clinical psychologist.

Furthermore, avoid fluids during the evening. It would also help if you walked around the block after supper and did some relaxing exercises before hitting the hay.

Don't go to bed earlier than usual if you missed sleep the night before, they said.

Since it is not recommended that naps be taken in the daytime, Reitav noted that bright lights help keep you alert and prevent you from nodding off during the day, especially after lunch.

"Sleeping problems are quite common," Lipsitz said. "There are 90 different sleep disorders, and except for apnea [breathing difficulties], they are easily recognized and treatable."

Lipsitz encouraged seniors to volunteer at his centre if they still have trouble sleeping after implementing his suggestions.

Taking sleeping pills may be a controversial solution, Reitav said, and if medication is taken, do not do so more than two or three times a week.

New, promising drugs for sleep will soon be on the market, Lipsitz said.

In the 65 and over category, the number of women having difficulty sleeping jumps to 38 percent, while with men it rises to 24 percent, he said.

Between the ages of 50 and 80, prepare to lose 27 minutes of sleep for every 10 years you age, Reitav said.

The good news is that there is no proof that sleep problems shorten your life, Reitav said. The bad news is that snoring may be a sign of apnea.

Lipsitz is currently working on a $6-million project involving fatigue and truck drivers. Reitav told the seniors that in one case a driver had only four hours sleep before driving a big rig for another 19 hours.

Lipsitz also does research on airline pilots and gambling casino staff.

In a survey conducted in the United States, 70 percent of the respondents stated that they did not mention their sleeping problems to their doctors.

A young, fit person needs 8½ hours sleep a night and most young people are not getting it, Reitav said, due to modern life and its whirl of activities.

Seniors & Health

Dr. Shelley Veinish

Dear Dr. Veinish,

My mother died after a brief illness last November. Since then, my father has lost interest in many activities, including his passion for the stock market! Whenever I visit, the house is a mess, he is unshaven and his clothes appear soiled. Last week, he missed another appointment to have his hearing aid checked. When I asked him about it, he said he thought it was cancelled. I think he's still grieving, but he denies it. He also insists his memory is "just fine." What can I do? I feel very alone.

John

Dear John,

You are not alone. These are questions which most of us must confront as our parents age: "How do we distinguish between depression and dementia?" and "How can we help our parents as they grow more frail?" I will attempt to address both issues in this and next month's column.

Your mother died six months ago. Your father's behaviour today thus reflects more than a simple grief reaction. Although sadness and preoccupation with loss are common after the death of a loved one, persistent symptoms associated with a functional decline usually suggest another diagnosis.

Is your father clinically depressed? This can certainly cause a person to withdraw and lose interest in activities. Difficulties with concentration may also occur, leading to problems with attending and remembering. You indicate his hygiene has deteriorated. This may reflect the lack of pride and poor self-esteem often seen in a mood disorder. Your father clearly requires a medical evaluation. Regardless of the precipitant, depression is a medical illness that requires treatment and follow-up by a skilled practitioner.

Your first contact should be your father's family physician. Your father may then further benefit from referral for a comprehensive geriatric assessment to further delineate his mood and memory problems. Ideally, a home visit by a multidisciplinary team can address all of the issues, identify potential safety concerns and better define your father's needs to help you develop a plan. It is therefore important for you to attend all appointments with your father – to both ask and answer questions which may arise.

You can also request a referral to your Community Care Access Centre (CCAC) in Ontario, or to the community or home-care program in your province, for in-home services including personal care assistance. You need not go it alone. Good luck.

Next month, I will explore in more detail how depression may sometimes masquerade as dementia, and how the reverse is often true as well.

Dr. Shelley Veinish is a geriatrician at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and assistant professor in the faculty of medicine at the University of Toronto.

Canadian rabbis visit MPs on Parliament Hill

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Fifteen rabbis went to Ottawa May 3 to present Israel's case because of a perception that "grassroots" lobbying by Canadian Jews is sorely lacking, according to the rabbi who conceived of the mission.

Mount Royal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, "was nudging me that [grassroots] Jews were not lobbying effectively in Ottawa," Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz of Montreal told The CJN.

"The 'professionals' were lobbying, but from the base of our community, they were just not there."

The result, after a month of planning, was a first-time mission of rabbis from all streams of Judaism, who went to Parliament Hill from four Canadian cities: Montreal, Toronto, Ottawa and Kingston.

The message they brought was clear and unequivocal: that Canadian Jews support Israel as one and that they expect Canadian policy, including at the United Nations, not to apply any "moral equivalence" between Israel and the Palestinians.

Although Rabbi Steinmetz was instrumental in conceiving of the mission, the real preparatory work for the trip was done by the Canada-Israel Committee in Quebec and Ontario.

Rabbi Steinmetz said the impact of the trip could not be overestimated.

Rabbis, he said, spoke with a "moral authority" that Parliamentarians could not ignore.

First on the day's six-hour agenda was a meeting with Israeli Ambassador Chaim Divon.

Then at a luncheon hosted by the Canada-Israel Friendship Group's Carolyn Bennett, the rabbis were joined by several MPs and senators, among them, Cotler, Alphonse Gagliano, senators Lise Bacon, Leo Kolber, Sheila Finestone, Jerry Grafstein and Marcel Prud'homme, the latter a longtime critic of Israel.

The rabbis next held talks with two senior officials from the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade, Steve Hibbard and John Grant.

They did not meet, however, with Foreign Affairs Minister John Manley, who was about to leave for his trip to the Middle East.

The rabbis then split up to meet with officials from the Canadian political parties, including Bloc Québécois leader Gilles Duceppe and representatives of the Alliance, Conservative and Liberal parties.

Rabbi Steinmetz, who was at the meeting with the Alliance, said he was sure that what they expressed "got back to" leader Stockwell Day, and it may have influenced Day's strong pro-Israel message at the Canadian Jewish Congress Plenary Assembly in Toronto that weekend.

Typical of the message sent to Parliamentarians during the course of the day was that of Rabbi Moïse Ohana of the Ohr Hahayim synagogue in Montreal.

In a prepared text, Rabbi Ohana spoke of Israel's determination to have peace, but only one that cannot threaten her existence. "A peace for which one would be prepared to pay any price, including acquiescing to intimidation, violence, and to fanaticism... is the surest road to ruin."

He urged supporters of Israel in a position of leadership not to "inflict" on Israel the "politically convenient but morally repugnant" route of applying some sort of moral equivalence to the two sides.

Rabbi Steinmetz said the day in Ottawa was not intended to produce any immediate consequences with respect to Canadian policy.

"It's not a question of immediate accomplishment," he said. "it's a question of pattern.

"This, we felt, was a beginning," the beginning of grassroots initiatives that will continue.

"I'd love to tell you that the mission changed foreign policy. It didn't," Rabbi Steinmetz said, "but it will make a difference. Perhaps we can move the ball only three inches at a time, but it will go forward. The participants felt very, very good about it."

Rabbis who came from Quebec were rabbis Steinmetz, Ohana, Chananya Berzon, Moshe Jablon, Leigh Lerner, Reuben Poupko, Yonah Rosner, Mordecai Zeitz, Lionel Moses and Meyer Kizelnik.

From Ontario were rabbis Reuven Bulka and Ely Braun of Ottawa, Daniel Elkin of Kingston, and Moshe Shulman and Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Toronto.

JNF to honour Secters at Negev annual gala

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — In the early to mid-1990s, while Harvey Secter was studying law at Harvard, his wife Sandra served as a volunteer with the Boston Symphony, but she says it was difficult to find ways to be involved in community work in Boston.

When Harvey, who is now the dean of law at the University of Manitoba, finished at Harvard, he and Sandra were very happy to be coming back to Winnipeg.

"It is easy to become involved in community work in Winnipeg," Sandra says.

In recognition of their contribution to the Jewish community and Israel, the JNF this year is honouring Harvey and Sandra Secter at its annual Negev Gala Concert on June 19. The headliner will be stage and screen star Joel Grey.

The Negev Gala, which regularly draws up to 1,500 people, is the Winnipeg Jewish community's largest annual fund-raiser outside of the CJA campaign.

In fact, the Secters are second-generation philanthropists and community workers. The Gwen Secter Creative Living Centre – the National Council of Jewish Women's senior centre here – was named in honour of Harvey's late mother. His late father, Joe, was involved in many organizations, including the Jewish National Fund. Harvey's brother-in-law, Sam Guralnick, is a past president of the JNF, while Harvey serves on the board of advisers.

Harvey and Sandra Secter both began their community work some 40 years ago, as leaders of youth groups at the YMHA and BBYO. That's where they first met.

After university, Harvey went into the family retail clothing business. In the 1970s, he was invited to join the old Community Council board. He was a member of the committee struck to study the Jewish education system in Winnipeg. The result of that study was the formation of the Board of Jewish Education in the early 1980s and the amalgamation of the Talmud Torah and Peretz Schools.

In the general community, Harvey chaired the United Way Campaign in 1988, and in that capacity, he became involved with the University of Winnipeg, where he chaired the University Board of Regents.

"Winnipeg is amazing in that way," he says. "It is small enough that you can meet people, and one thing leads to another. My time with the University of Winnipeg was a wonderful experience."

In recent years, he has been mainly involved with foundations, including the Toronto-based Walter and Duncan Gordon Foundation. He feels that the future of philanthropy is largely dependent on endowment funding.

"The CJA does great work," he says, "but the demographics and government policies have changed. We need a sustainable source of long-term funding to maintain and enhance our current institutions and services."

Sandra was a founding member of the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre and was involved in helping to establish the new Sharon Home, south Winnipeg's Jewish care home for seniors, but she has probably made her greatest mark with the CJA campaign.

For the past few years, she has served as co-chair of the CJA Women's Campaign with Marcia Cowan. This year they are co-chairing the overall campaign.

The Secters have three children. Alan is in Monsey, N.Y., Beth in Calgary and Joel in Montreal.

Rabbis made a 'big' impression

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

As mentioned last week, a delegation of rabbis came to the Hill and brought a message of support for Israel and a call to politicians to echo the rabbis' concerns.

These religious leaders of the Jewish community felt a compelling need to share their angst over developments in the Middle East and over the perception that responsibility for the crisis rests with Israel. There was, according to some observers, no mistaking the passion with which they delivered the message. The question is: did their visit accomplish anything?

I do not know the rabbis' assessment of the exercise, but there was no shortage of comment about the visit from those on the Hill.

The group met with MPs and senators from all caucuses and, strange as it seems, all five parties were of one voice about the impact of the visit – albeit, for slightly different reasons. In a word, the visit made an impression on the parliamentarians… a big impression! Even the indefatigable pro-PLO booster, Senator Marcel Prud'homme expressed a heartfelt desire to pursue dialogue with the Jewish community.

For the Alliance MPs, the visit afforded them the chance to do some "spiritual" bonding. Especially for the evangelical component of the Canadian Alliance (which is significant), the encounter served as an opportunity to establish links that could translate into more political support amongst Jews. All they want in return for their support of Israel – which they claim would be forthcoming irrespective of partisan considerations – is some recognition within the Jewish community for the Alliance position.

For Liberals, this was an opportunity to continue the process of mending the fences damaged during the last election. MPs like Joe Volpe, who has been one of Israel's strongest and most effective supporters on the Hill, came out of the election with a slightly bitter taste in his mouth. For him and the rabbis of two very influential synagogues in Toronto, the exchange was all about "healing and reconnecting."

The Bloc has a particular interest in ensuring cordial relations with the Jewish community of Quebec. Word has it that the meeting on the Hill will be parlayed into even more high-profile encounters back home in Montreal – where it counts. Finally, much like in all else they do, both the NDP and the Tories managed to secure some presence, modest but nonetheless valuable visibility within a community that was once active within their respective ranks. (Hope springs eternal.)

So it would seem that for all sorts of the reasons, "the rabbis' done good"! Now if they could only get a couple of female colleagues to round out the group…

Jewish heritage captured in Bayefsky's works

A year ago, Bayefsky donated 22 of his Holocaust-themed works to Yad Vashem. These were part of the artist's Epilogue series, consisting of four large oil paintings and 41 pencil drawings, so named because they were completed between 1988 and 1994 – nearly five decades after his war-time experiences.

From Slavery to Freedom, oil on canvas by Aba Bayefsky 1923-2001.

The death camp "was shocking to the point that you can't really explain it," he told The CJN in an interview last April. "I was so affected by it, I couldn't abandon it." But years would pass before he could muster the strength to re-visit his memories.

Bayefsky often utilized biblical and talmudic themes in his work and published a portfolio of paintings titled "Tales From The Talmud."

The Canadian government presented a copy of the portfolio to then Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin when he visited Canada in 1978. President Josip Tito of Yugoslavia was also presented with a Bayefsky portfolio on his visit to Ottawa.

But it was with his Jewish heritage that Bayefsky was most fascinated.

He made thousands of sketches and paintings of Kensington Market, and painted scenes of Jerusalem and other locales in Israel.

"He was drawn to marketplace life," said his daughter, Anne, a law professor at York University and a leading human rights advocate. "He drew market scenes all through the world. He celebrated life in the markets and people who toiled in them."

Bayefsky also explored the legends, mythologies and tales of Indian, Japanese and other cultures in his work, which has been exhibited in, among other places, New York, Chicago, London, Tokyo and India.

He "applied an understanding of humanity to many cultures, peoples and their environment," said his daughter.

Bayefsky often chided Canadian artists for ignoring the larger world. Goya, he said, commented on the Inquisition, and Picasso's most famous work was Guernica, an indictment of the Spanish Civil War.

It was his belief in the interconnectedness of art and social commentary that drove him to his Holocaust themes, she said, "to show that anti-Semitism was still around – and today is often turned into anti-Israel [sentiments]."

Bayefsky visited Israel many times and painted its landscapes and sketched in its hills. "He captured the light and mood of its physical beauty, as well as its historical dimensions," Anne said.

Her father had a strong sense of family, she said, noting that he spent every Friday night with his children, and then his grandchildren after they were born.

"He was my teacher; my guide. He had an inner courage and strength of character which was committed not only to his family, but was shared with the world at large through his paintings."

Bayefsky was born in Toronto in 1923, the second son of a Russian-born father and a Scottish mother. During his teens, he attended after-school classes at the Children's Art Centre of the Art Gallery of Ontario. There he was encouraged by Group of Seven artists Arthur Lismer and A.Y. Jackson.

Bayefsky once told The CJN it was the 1938 biographical movie Rembrandt, starring Charles Laughton, that persuaded him to switch from the academic stream at Central Tech High School and enroll in the Academy Julian in Paris.

He enlisted in the Royal Canadian Air Force in 1942 and after winning an art competition in 1944, was given the rank of Flying Officer and appointed an official war artist.

He was attached to 39 Reconnaissance Wing of the 2nd Tactical Air Force in early 1945. In May, he was moved forward to an airbase in northern Germany.

"A few miles away was Bergen-Belsen," he said in 1998. "When I heard what was there, I went immediately and it has clearly affected my thinking."

On his first visit to the camp, he sketched a newly dug pit filled with the bodies of inmates. He returned in a week to sketch another pit and a starving German Jewish boy. The boy died the next day. On his third visit he sketched a slave.

Consumed with the inhumanity he witnessed, Bayefsky created works in which skeletal figures and dark colours were prominent.

"For the first time," he would recall, "I became aware of man's monstrous capacity for evil." One would think, he mused, "that after such a catastrophic occurrence, anti-Semitism would have disappeared."

Bayefsky was "always a gentleman and a mensch," remarked artist Charles Pachter, a former student. "I took Saturday morning art classes at the Art Gallery of Ontario, and he would always shlep us down to St. Lawrence Market or Kensington Market to draw. He was very dignified."

After the war, Bayefsky returned to Europe on a French government scholarship and depicted displaced persons living in DP camps.

He went on to become the first faculty member of the Ontario College of Art to have a one-man show there. In all, Bayefsky had some 50 one-man exhibits showcasing both his European and Canadian works. He served as president of the Canadian Group of Painters, the successor to the Group of Seven, and in 1979, was named to the Order of Canada.

In addition to the Canadian War Museum, Bayefsky's work hangs in the Art Gallery of Ontario, Hart House and in many corporate halls and private homes.

Despite twice-weekly dialysis treatments toward the end of his life, he still spent six and seven days a week in his King Street studio.

"I am never blank," he said once. "I have more material in my mind today than I can possibly use in a lifetime."

He is survived by his wife, Evelyn; children Anne, Edra and Eban; and grandchildren Rachel, Daniel, Sarah, Michelle and Sammy.

Manley calls for end to settlement construction

By DAN IZENBERG
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Canadian Foreign Affairs Minister John Manley capped an eight-day whirlwind tour of the Middle East with a visit to Israel, during which he called on the government to stop all settlement construction.

Israel was the last stop on Manley's trip, which also included Egypt, the Palestinian Authority (PA) and Jordan. He arrived in Jerusalem late Saturday night and met with President Moshe Katsav, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Foreign Minister Shimon Peres the following day.

Earlier, Manley had visited Yad Vashem and the new foreign ministry building, currently under construction, which was designed through a joint Canadian-Israeli venture that included architects A.J. Diamond, Donald Schmitt and Company.

Manley tried to play a conciliatory role during his Middle East trip and during his visit with PA Chairman Yasser Arafat earlier in the week, said he had not come to "assign blame."

In his talk with to Peres, however, he clearly called for an end to Jewish settlement construction in the West Bank and Gaza.

"I restated our view that the Mitchell report provides a sound basis for moving forward from here, and I urged very strongly Mr. Peres to give me the ability to say that Israel was ready to act on the recommendations of the Mitchell report, including the recommendation on settlements," Manley told reporters at a press conference following his meeting with Peres.

"Canada's position is consistent with the Mitchell report, which is that the continuation of the settlements must stop. That is what needs to be done for there to be a basis in order to move forward with any peace process."

Peres said that Israel's attitude to the Mitchell report, which calls on Israel to stop settlement construction and on the Palestinians to halt the violence, was "positive." However, he said, the government planned to submit "one or two remarks," including a rejection of the call for a halt to settlements.

Sharon's government has undertaken not to build any more settlements or to confiscate Palestinian land, Peres said. However, it insists on providing for the natural growth needs of the more than 200,000 Jewish settlers currently living in the West Bank and Gaza.

"If a couple gets married or a child is born, and if you have to build a kindergarten, it is very difficult to stop it," Peres said, adding that the settlement issue should be one of the subjects of discussion after the negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians resume.

First and foremost, the violence must stop.

"We must return to the negotiations," Peres said. "We must stop shooting and start talking. It's as clear cut as that."

When asked why Israel insisted on building more apartments in the settlements when large numbers of the ones already completed stand empty, Peres replied, "There are empty houses in places where people don't want to be and there is a demand for houses in other places.

"We cannot force people to go to one place and not another. So, while the picture is as you have described it, people are making their own choices."

Peres also told reporters he had informed Manley of the unilateral steps Israel intends to take in order to ease the Palestinians' plight. These include reducing the IDF closure on Palestinian towns and villages, increasing the number of Israeli work permits for Palestinians, allowing free movement within the Palestinian areas themselves, easing restrictions on imports and exports, and increasing the number of Palestinian merchants allowed into Israel from 1,000 to 5,000.

Israel intends to repair the railway line connecting the Gaza Strip to Tulkarm in the West Bank, Peres added. According to the Oslo Accords, Israel was supposed to have opened two "safe passage" highways between the two sections of the PA, but has never done so because of the security risks involved.

Manley's first stop in the morning was at Yad Vashem, the memorial to the victims of the Holocaust. The foreign minister, who was seeing the shrine for the second time, wrote in a guest book: "Although my last visit to Yad Vashem in 1994 was a powerful and moving experience, today's special exhibit, No Child's Play, was even more profound. No parent of healthy, well-adjusted children can avoid the sense of good fortune that is mixed with sadness when one's own experience is compared with that of parents whose children lived in such horrors. May it never occur again."

Later in the afternoon, at a meeting with Sharon, Manley clashed with the prime minister when he once again called on Israel to adopt the Mitchell report recommendations and the terms of the Egyptian-Jordanian initiative.

When Manley said that Egypt and Jordan "took a risk" in proposing theat initiative, Sharon replied, "They did not take any risk and no one has to take risks at our expense. I will never compromise on the safety and lives of Israeli citizens."

Sharon also rejected the call to halt all settlement construction and said that all the governments of Israel had supported the settlement enterprise.

Curriculum changes: Livnat

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A new subject, Jewish heritage, will be introduced in middle schools from next year, Education Minister Limor Livnat announced Sunday.

Livnat told a news conference in Jerusalem that the new course will be taken by all students registered in the secular state schools for seventh, eighth and ninth grades, and will teach sections of the Talmud, the weekly Torah portion, as well as about Jewish holidays and "important figures in the history of Zionism." It will also prepare students for bar or bat mitzvahs.

The new course is part of Livnat's campaign to introduce more "Jewish, Zionist and national values" into the curriculum.

"Students must know their heritage," she said. "It is inconceivable that they should not know the meaning of terms like siddur [prayer book], tfillah [prayer] and tfillin [phylacteries]."

Israel attacks PA militia

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Palestinian officials decry as war crimes Israel's "pinpoint" helicopter strikes – including a recent one that killed a militia member suspected of planning attacks on Israelis.

But an Israeli cabinet member says they are acts of self-defence.

"They are not assassinations," Science Minister Matan Vilnai told Israel Radio on Sunday. "We are hitting the people who attack us or are planning attacks.

"If you are fired on and you fire back, that is self-defence. So if you do it 10 minutes earlier, is that not self-defence?"

Vilnai turned to the Talmud to justify killing Palestinians suspected of plotting violence against Israelis.

"If somebody comes to kill you, rise early and kill him first," Vilnai said.

Palestinians say the attacks are extrajudicial assassinations of figures Israel accuses of planning and carrying out attacks.

According to witnesses, on Saturday, Israeli army helicopters fired on a car travelling in Jenin, a West Bank city. The car was carrying members of the Palestinians' Tanzim militia.

One passenger, Motassem Sabah, was killed. Palestinian sources said a Palestinian police officer who was standing nearby also was killed and 17 Palestinians were wounded.

Reports said the first rocket missed the car, and the other passengers were able to flee before a second rocket hit the mark. Sabah could not get out in time because of a previous injury.

Among the passengers who fled the car was Abdel Karim Oweis, whom Palestinian sources said could have been the target of the strike.

Israeli security officials said Oweis heads a militia cell – whose members include Sabah – that was working to transfer mortar bombs from the Gaza Strip to the West Bank and that was planning to fire them on the Israeli settlements of Kadim and Ganim.

Israeli security sources also said Sabah had been involved in shooting attacks on Israelis and in planting bombs.

The head of Palestinian intelligence in the West Bank, Tawfik Tirawi, was quoted as denying the Israeli allegations.

Palestinian officials denounced Saturday's strike, and a group affiliated with Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's Fatah party vowed to avenge the killings.

Following Israel's capture last week of a Gaza-bound fishing boat carrying weapons – including Katyusha rockets and shoulder-launched anti-aircraft missiles – from Lebanon, Israeli officials have warned against Palestinian efforts to escalate the fighting.

In other weekend violence, two Israeli soldiers were lightly wounded last Friday when a grenade was thrown from a passing Palestinian vehicle toward an Israel Defence Force outpost in Gush Katif in the Gaza Strip. Palestinians also fired 11 mortars at Israeli settlements inside the Gaza Strip and at kibbutzim in Israel.

A resident of the Neveh Dekalim settlement in Gaza was wounded in one of the mortar attacks.

A 16-year-old Palestinian boy died of wounds sustained during clashes with IDF troops while demonstrating last Friday in Gaza.

In another incident that day, two Polish tourists were treated for shock after a pipe bomb hidden beneath some bushes exploded near the Jaffa Gate outside the walls of Jerusalem's Old City.

On Saturday, a 13-year-old girl from the Israeli community of Bat Hefer was lightly wounded Saturday by gunfire from the West Bank.

Sunday reports said Israeli security forces detained eight Palestinians in the Tulkarm and Bethlehem areas for suspected involvement in terrorist activity.

And on Sunday evening, an Israeli was lightly wounded in the hand when shots were fired at his car in the West Bank.

Reports said IDF troops on Sunday also neutralized bombs discovered in southern Gaza near the border with Egypt.

Israel gives OK to Mitchell Report

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel was expected to announce this week that, on the whole, it accepts the international, fact-finding Mitchell Committee report, but with reservations about two items: the demand for an absolute settlement freeze and criticism of Israel Defence Forces (IDF) operations in the territories.

— This response was finalized at a late-night meeting called by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon on Sunday.

Foreign Minister Shimon Peres proposed adopting the committee's report in its entirety, but the proposal was rejected. Peres explained that from his talks with Palestinian officials, he believes the report can serve as a basis for negotiations, while from his talks with European and American officials, he fears an Israeli rejection of the report would bring international isolation in its wake.

"We agreed to accept the Jordanian-Egyptian initiative as a basis for discussions, so there is no reason to reject the Mitchell report, which is more balanced," a senior government source said last night. He added that according to the proposal, the settlement freeze would take effect only after the violence stopped.

Both Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA) were slated to submit their official responses to the report this week.

The U.S. administration, though it has welcomed the report in general, will issue its detailed response only after it has received and studied the responses from the two sides.

Editorials in several leading American newspapers have urged the Sharon administration to adopt the report as the basis for a new diplomatic initiative. But government sources in Jerusalem believe the United States will refrain from adopting the report's specific recommendations, saying instead this is a matter for the parties to the conflict to decide.

Former senator George Mitchell, who chaired the committee, said in an interview with the Washington Post that, although the Bush administration will have to play an active role in achieving peace, Israel and the PA are the ones that will have to decide if they find the report useful.

The Israeli response would object to the report's linking the ending of the violence with the freezing of settlement construction, pointing out that under the Oslo accords, the fate of the settlements is to be determined during the final-status talks.

Israel was also expected to point out that the coalition guidelines already pledge that no settlements will be established, but that the government is obliged to provide for the settlers' "ongoing needs." Peres added yesterday that Israel will not confiscate any additional lands in the territories; any additional housing needed in the settlements will be built on existing lands.

Israel's other main objection to the report is its criticism of the IDF's responses to Palestinian violence, which the report said were sometimes excessive. Israel argues that the IDF has generally been restrained in its use of force against Palestinian attacks.

Europe, meanwhile, is stepping up its pressure on Israel to adopt both the Mitchell Report and the Egyptian-Jordanian peace initiative.

Both call for an absolute freeze on settlement construction, as well as a ceasefire, a cooling-off period and confidence-building measures, followed by the resumption of diplomatic negotiations.

UK Muslims targeting pro-Israel MPs in vote

By SHARON SADEH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LONDON — Prime Minister Tony Blair's recent announcement of a June 7 election has opened a second race: efforts by activists in the 1.5 million-strong Muslim community to defeat pro-Israel candidates, mostly from Labour, in the upcoming vote.

An Internet site dubbed www.votesmart.org.uk was established "to help Muslim voters take an active role determining the identity of the next government."

The site's slogan is "Don't just vote. Vote smart," and it tries to persuade Muslim voters to take advantage of their numbers in constituencies where the MP is "not so committed to Muslim goals," and to vote for the sitting MP's opponent.

The site ranks candidates in every voting district according to their commitment to Muslim causes, with the rankings determined by parliamentary votes, speeches and the number of Muslims in the constituency.

Some of the information is wrong, but three constituencies are singled out as particularly important, and in them, Labour MPs with pro-Israeli views have been identified for defeat. The site lists issues of concern to Muslims, with the foremost the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Under the heading "How one nation's dream turned into another nation's nightmare?" the site's editors – who remain anonymous – describe the establishment of "Zionist Israel" in "Muslim Palestine" as a "bizarre exploitation of 20th-century diplomatic efforts that since 1948 have complicated the lives of millions of Arabs and Jews."

The Web site is just the tip of the iceberg. MP Barry Gardiner from North Barnet, a member of the Labour party's Friends of Israel Association, says he has been told that he's been "targeted" because of his "Zionist connections," and adds that he's been warned to "watch my back."

Another MP, Mike Gapes from South Ilford, who serves as the deputy chair of the friendship society, has been under general attack for weeks, with leaflets against him distributed in his constituency by an organization called The Ilford Muslim Association, whose purpose is to decrease the massive popularity Gapes enjoys in his district. In the last election, he won by 14,000 votes.

The leaflets handed out in the mosques of the district claim that Gapes is a "Muslim-hater," an Israel-defender, an enemy of human rights, and is hostile to Muslims wherever they may be. The leaflets carry a picture of a Palestinian youth standing opposite an Israeli tank with a caption saying, "Mike Gapes is no friend of the Muslims."

Gapes rejects the criticism. "A small group of fanatics opposed to the peace process and to Israel's right to exist are running this campaign. They pretend to speak on behalf of the Muslims in my district, but beyond the fact that they present inaccuracies, like the number of Muslims in the district, the fact is that most support my candidacy. In their obsession to beat me, they are dangerously exploiting the religious card, which is not usually used in British politics because of the dangerous influence it had in Northern Ireland. Quoting me, they deliberately ignore my real positions, some of which are not popular among Israelis, like the rights of the Palestinian people to a state. I am in favour of dialogue and general compromise and they don't like that."

British security officials say there is a possible connection between the activity in Ilford and a group called The Islamic Human Rights Commission, which acts as a mouthpiece for radical Islamic groups. They are worried that some of the militant activists from Ilford may become involved in hitherto moderate groups.

Gapes is particularly angry about a report on Channel 4 that covered the struggle against the pro-Israel candidates. What sparked his ire was that the reporter, a journalist named Faisal Bodi, recently wrote in the Guardian that Israel has no moral right to exist. In a letter to Greg Dyke, the BBC director general, Gapes writes that the report was "totally imbalanced," and that he felt he was ambushed because he was asked to comment on the subject for the report, which was merely a platform to "advance an extremist position."

The radio program's editor, Prue Keely, said the reporter was chosen for the report because of his "known connections to elements who represent extreme Muslim views," but she admitted that it would have been proper to emphasize at the opening of the report that the reporter had declared himself pro-Muslim. Bodi claims that he knows how to distinguish between opinion and news reporting and that he never belonged to any Muslim organization.

Gapes told Ha'aretz that he is not satisfied with the BBC's answer, and that he wants a full apology.

Israel intercepts deadly cargo

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Last week, for the first time since the Palestinian Authority (PA) began its violent activities against Israel, Israel's security forces succeeded in intercepting a large quantity of arms, ammunition and explosive material being smuggled into the Gaza Strip by sea. The arms came from Lebanon, and their seizure was the result of a joint operation by the intelligence corps, the navy and the air force.

It is known that the yacht was never intended to land in Gaza, but that it was supposed to be met by a fishing boat, manned by Egyptian fishermen, who would transfer the arms to a Palestinian fishing boat that would then carry them to Gaza. It is only recently that Israel has responded to Palestinian requests to ease life for the local population by expanding the stretch of water in which Palestinian boats are allowed to fish.

Since the start of the intifadah, it has been clear that the Palestinians have been smuggling arms and ammunition, including mortars, into the territories. The fact that they are demonstrating no real lack of ammunition is proof of this. Various reports indicated that the Palestinians planned to smuggle in a mortar with a larger diameter from either Egypt or Lebanon, or even Katyusha components that would be put together in the territories, in order to increase their striking range within Israel.

Most of the smuggling is presumably done via underground tunnels between Gaza and Sinai. Other routes are via the Dead Sea or in trucks crossing from Jordan to the West Bank. There are also indications that some smuggling is occurring by sea, and that this is Hezbollah's preferred route for sending arms to Gaza. The intelligence services and the IDF consider their inability to block any of these routes a failure. Had they been able to so, the Palestinians would have been suffering a shortage of ammunition for some time now.

The capture of these arms increases the question marks surrounding Arafat's recent claim that he wants to resume security co-operation with Israel and has instructed his security forces to do so.

It is also proof that the PA is violating security agreements, and that such violations began long before the outbreak of the violence last September. The purchase of arms in Lebanon should make countries that are sending money to the PA begin asking questions about how part of this money is being used.

From a military standpoint, this recent capture clearly will not end the smuggling; the Palestinians will try to develop new routes. This obliges Israel to tighten the siege and increase security checks of ships en route to Gaza, and to once again restrict the waters in which Palestinians are allowed to fish. It also makes it imperative for Israel to refuse permission for construction of a deepwater port in Gaza as long as the Palestinians are waging war against it.

Ahmed Jibril, leader of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine – General Command has since stated that his group sent the weapons. — Ed.

The Week in Israel

May 7

• Prime Minister Ariel Sharon apologized after IDF troops killed a Palestinian infant girl when they shelled the Khan Yunis refugee camp. The troops were responding to a mortar attack from the building in which the infant and her family lived.

• The IDF announced that the navy had intercepted a Lebanese boat carrying Katyusha rockets, anti-aircraft missiles and other weapons bound for the Gaza Strip. Much of the weaponry was forbidden under the Oslo accord.

May 8

• Ahmed Jibril, the leader of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine – General Command, acknowledged that his group sent the weapons seized by the IDF navy. He vowed there would be more shipments.

• A 44-year-old man, Aryeh Agranioni, was killed while guarding empty mobile homes near the community of Itamar. A previously unknown terror group claimed responsibility.

May 9

• The mutilated bodies of two 14-year-old boys were discovered in a cave near the boys' homes in Tekoa. Yosef Ishran and Kobi Mandell were killed with stones and knives.

May10

• The Vatican said it hopes the Pope's silence in the face of anti-Jewish and anti-Israel comments by Bashar Assad during the Pope's visit to Syria would not damage Vatican relations with Israel.

May 11

• IDF tanks sent five surface-to-surface rockets whistling into Gaza City, hitting a Fatah office and the Palestinian Authority's agency responsible for arms manufacturing in Gaza. It was in retaliation for the bombing of a group of Romanian workers repairing an electronic security fence near Kisufim.

Fairness in journalism possible

In the Spring/Summer 1998 issue of Media Studies Journal, which was devoted to the topic What's Fair?, two dozen journalists and professors of journalism grappled with the hard-to-define, yet intuitively graspable concept of "fairness" in news reporting.

One editor wrote of journalism as a "quest for accuracy and perspective that would eventually produce truth." "News," he went on, was best defined as a "truthful, comprehensive, and intelligent account of the day's events in a context which gives them meaning." In fulfilling this definition, it was suggested, the journalist achieves fairness.

Easier said than done, perhaps, but possible nonetheless.

Mike Hornbrook's two-minute report on May 8 for CBC Radio's World at Six serves to illustrate this definition of fairness. (Fairness is also one of the CBC's three guiding journalistic principles, along with accuracy and integrity.)

Hornbrook was reporting on the funeral in the Gaza Strip for the four-month-old Palestinian baby in the Khan Yunis refugee camp. The baby was tragically but accidentally killed by shrapnel from an Israeli shell launched in retaliation for Palestinian mortar attacks near her home.

Hornbrook described the "rage against Israel" that characterized the funeral and related how pictures of the dead baby "appeared on the front pages of Arab newspapers" across the region, "stirring grief and hatred."

Hornbrook's report went beyond merely explaining that Israel had fired the shell "after four mortar rounds landed in Jewish settlements in Gaza," and beyond citing Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's repeated apology for the baby's death and his plea to keep children out of the current conflict. Hornbrook provided important context that, within the limits of a very brief report, filled out the picture: "Ariel Sharon said Palestinians shoot mortars from behind schools and then disappear within minutes. He called on Yasser Arafat to stop the violence."

That was not all. Hornbrook then widened the lens to provide additional meaning for the events in Gaza: "Yesterday the Israelis intercepted a boatload of heavy weapons bound for Gaza. The weapons included Katyusha rockets, anti-aircraft missiles and anti-tank mines. Together, they represent a serious escalation in Palestinian fire power. The death of the Palestinian baby was a public relations disaster for the Israelis, but with evidence of powerful new weapons in the hands of militants, Israel can show the world what it's facing in the ongoing conflict."

Both sides' views were presented in this report. Hornbrook betrayed no bias towards one party or the other. No sarcasm, which other reporters sometimes display, intruded into his script. He played it straight, providing facts within layers of context that lent his report meaning. Fairness achieved.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When she was only 12 years old, Karen Shopsowitz already knew she would be a filmmaker – some day at least.

Today, with more than a dozen films behind her, mainly documentaries, she has achieved her childhood ambition.

Two of her latest movies, My Father's Camera and I Am A Rose, were recently screened on TVOntario and Vision TV, respectively.

Shopsowitz, 42, is now hard at work on a new Women's Network series, Family Dance, scheduled to air in the autumn.

She attributes her interest in film to her late father, Israel Shopsowitz, an avid home moviemaker who was hooked on the medium by the time he was a teenager.

Although her dad thought he would be a professional photographer, he drifted into the family business, Shopsy's Delicatessen, founded by his parents in 1922.

Still, even as a restaurateur, Israel Shopsowitz never lost his yen for home movies, and encouraged his daughter's cinematic dreams.

Her entry into cinema was by way of journalism. After earning a degree from Carleton University in 1981, she became a freelancer, reporting on sports and entertainment.

In 1987, she enrolled at York University, taking a post-graduate degree in film and video. " I always wanted to make films," she explained. "It nagged at me."

Looking back at the trajectory of her career, she is anything but sorry she did not get into film earlier.

"I needed more maturity and journalism was great training," she said.

Shopsowitz made her first film, My Grandparents Had A Hotel, in 1989 as an MA thesis.

Broadcast on Vision TV, it was an affectionate portrait of Harry and Jenny Shopsowitz, the operators of the Monteith Inn, a Jewish resort on Lake Rosseau in Muskoka.

Since then, she has churned out six independent documentaries and a dozen films for the National Film Board of Canada, the History Channel, Vision TV, CBC Newsworld and TVOntario.

"I like films with a great story line and compelling characters," she said.

Two of her documentaries, A Lot To Share (1994) and A Place To Save Your Life (1992), have strong Jewish themes.

Karen Shopsowitz

The first one is about a Toronto synagogue and a mosque that share a parking lot. The second one tells of European Jewish refugees who found a haven in Shanghai, China, during the Holocaust.

My Father's Camera, which she claims is the first documentary about home movies, relies heavily on her father's 16mm and Super 8 footage.

I Am A Rose, on the other hand, is about a grieving father who completes his late daughter's climb to the summit of a mountain in Mexico.

Family Dance is far different, being a drama about middle-aged women sandwiched between career, family and aging parents.

Apart from television, Shopsowitz's films are usually seen at movie festivals and museums.

In recent years, she has exhibited them at the Montreal International Film Festival, the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, the Judah L, Magnes Museum in California, the Jewish Museum in Berlin and the Art Gallery of Ontario.

Shopsowitz, whose husband Marc Landau is a camerman at the Weather Network, has hardly grown rich as a filmmaker.

Nevertheless, she is supremely fulfilled. "You do it for passion," Shopsowitz said. "You have to love what you're doing and I do."

Jewish audiences are hard to please

By BEN ROSE
Special to CJN

TORONTO — Jews like to make fun of themselves, but not in front of non-Jewish audiences, a Comedy on Wrye panel agreed at the recent Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

This is all the more ironic, said panelist David Steinberg, because most of the Hollywood and TV writers and executives are Jewish. "They are worried that they [have to] stay in tune with mass entertainment and they don't think Jewish jokes are in," he said.

Steinberg and the other panelists, Mark Breslin, Gail Singer and Diane Flacks, and moderator Michael Wex also agreed that Jewish audiences are hard to please.

In Vancouver, Singer said by way of example, she once publicly thanked a lot of relatives by name for coming out, but one little old aunt later asked her, "Why didn't you ask us to stand up?"

Flacks said she got a lot of criticism over her portrayal of what went on at the Passover seders in the play Sibs.

"Jews have an extraordinary ability to deliver humour under surprising conditions," said Wex, who bemoaned the fact that he was given the job of handling four performers with different opinions. "Don't expect to leave here happy," he said.

Breslin said he had a grandfather who counted up the number of Jews and non-Jews in the death notices each day to see what side was gaining in population.

A mirth-provoking film clip of Sid Caesar playing a Nazi general on the Show of Shows illustrates how Jews will make fun of their oppressors, said Wex, adding that ironically Erich von Stroheim, who was Caesar's hilarious batman in the sketch, converted from Judaism to Catholicism.

The "big book of German humour" is a pamphlet, chimed in Breslin.

The days are over when a comedian could get a laugh just by mentioning the word gatkes, because Jewish audiences are more sophisticated today, Wex said.

Steinberg, the Winnipeg-born comedian, said show business is so crazy that one time, the agent for Sholom Aleichem at the last minute withdrew permission to use a story, and so he had to improvise a script for which he couldn't claim credit.

"The final blow came when a critic said the major credit for the show should go to Sholom Aleichem," he said.

The comic said he was asked once by Johnny Carson not to use certain material with a Jewish angle because "audiences weren't ready for it."

He said many Jews wait for the credits of a TV show or film to come on and get satisfaction out of seeing how many Jewish names there are among the actors or crew.

Breslin said he knew a popular Reform rabbi who lost his congregation because he turned up at the wrong funeral and delivered a eulogy.

Later, on a more serious note, Breslin asked why "doesn't Israel rub off" on Jews who still see themselves as inferior?

This drew a reply from several in the audience, who said Canadian immigration patterns are 50 years behind those in the United States and that eventually Jews in Canada will feel more at home.

CANTORIAL CONCERT FEATURES YAAKOV MOTZEN AND FRIENDS

An exciting repertoire of cantorial, Hebrew, chassidic and operatic compositions is on the program of the Shaarei Shomayim Congregation's fourth annual cantorial concert, featuring Toronto's own Cantor Yaakov Motzen and some magnificently voiced friends.

Cantors Benjamin Warschawski and Avi Albrecht, both of Baltimore, and Toronto Cantor Shlomo Simcha Sufrin (who is the synagogue's second cantor) join with Motzen in song.

The cantors will be accompanied by pianist Daniel Gildar and the Shaarei Shomayim Choir. Tickets ($50, $36 and $20) are available from the synagogue office. Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, 470 Glencairn Ave. Tuesday, May 22, 7:45 p.m. 416-789-3213.

Defending the Caveman: Rob Becker is described as a "peacemaker in the ongoing misunderstandings between men and women," and his one-man show, Defending the Caveman, is said to inspire roars of laughter as well as much post-performance tenderness and hand-holding between married couples.

Becker has performed his award-winning monologue from Iceland to Israel, and brings it back to Toronto May 30 to June 17. Pantages Theatre. $25 to $69.50. 416-870-8000.

Holocaust Books for Young Readers: Second Story Press publisher Margie Wolfe, the daughter of Holocaust survivors, has established a Holocaust Remembrance Series for young readers. The inaugural volume in the series is Clara's War, by Kathy Kacer.

Kacer is the author of The Secrets of Gabi's Dresser, a work of historical fiction for young people that has won a Jewish Book Award and other prizes and commendations, and has gone into five printings since its release several years ago.

Clara's War tells the story of a 13-year-old girl and her family who are imprisoned in Terezin, and therefore acquainted with hunger, disease, filth and brutality. But Clara also makes friends and learns about art and culture, and finds that with "faith and courage" she and her fellow inmates can "rise above the tragedy" and experience "moments of joy and laughter."

The quotes are from a Second Story press release. If they seem a trifle upbeat, consider how difficult would be the task of producing a Holocaust book for juveniles without any such uplifting moral in tow.

Those familiar with the Terezin legend will correctly surmise that Clara becomes immersed in the children's opera Brundibar, the now-famous theatrical production that Terezin inmates performed more than 50 times between 1943 and 1945. For some, the opera provided a welcome distraction from the morbid reality that Terezin's inmates were being systematically shipped to the Auschwitz death camp.

Clara's War goes beyond the normal requirements of fiction by providing some documentary accoutrements – a map and photographs of the ghetto, and a reproduction of an underground ghetto newspaper review of Brundibar.

Kacer, a former psychologist who worked with troubled teens in Toronto, now speaks frequently to groups of young people about the Holocaust. She acknowledges the tremendous assistance she had in writing the book from Torontonian John Freund, a survivor of Terezin and Auschwitz.

Clara's War is available at select bookstores. (Paperback, $8.95.) To reach Second Story Press, call 416-537-7850.

Reznic performs at veterans' aid concert

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Romanian-born, Israeli-raised violinist and composer Mirel Reznic will perform at a concert presented by Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel, Beit Halochem Canada on Thursday, May 31, at the Toronto Centre for the Arts Recital Hall.

Reznic has an extensive repertoire of the gypsy music of his youth as well as Jewish folk and religious songs, classics by the great American composers, and jazz standards.

Born in 1955 in Romania during the Communist regime, Reznic started to play the violin at age 5. At 17, he applied to study classical violin at the music academy of Cluj, Transylvania. He was one of 360 students applying for eight places.

Though Romania at this time was a very difficult place for the Jews, after a comprehensive series of tests and despite the anti-Semitic attitude of the rector, he was admitted to the academy and graduated in 1975.

Wildlife on demand at game reserve in South Africa

By BARBARA KINGSTONE
Special to The CJN

KRUGER NATIONAL PARK, South Africa — I'm currently on a soft adventure kick in my travels and I've discovered that a vast variety of themes are available. I've crawled through tunnels in Vietnam, stayed overnight in a "renovated" cave in Spain. In Sarawak, I witnessed six million nocturnal bats clinging to the interior ceiling of one of the world's biggest and oldest caves.

Another unique experience was my stay at Singita Game Reserve, a private lodge in South Africa. Singita means "the miracle," and in my short time there, I felt it was just that.

Located near the renowned Kruger National Park, Singita offers luxurious accommodations and majestic views of the animals that roam freely in the area, making this the photo opportunity of a lifetime.

The lodge is divided into two sections of nine double suites each. In both lodges, there is a glassed in bathroom with a shower that allows you a view of the giant ebony trees. And if by good luck, a roaming cheetah or lion were to pass, just a glance out at the African bushveld would make it a memorable stay.

After the first early morning safari, while I had breakfast on the terrace of the main building of the Colonial-style Ebony Lodge, I could hear the soft sound of the gently flowing Sand River just below. At the next table were newlyweds on their honeymoon from Kuwait. Guests became acquainted by comparing notes on what they had seen – a score card of the animal watching "buffet" that was was served via safari, twice a day.

Daily at 5 a.m., a knock on the door would wake me for the day's first safari with our ranger Lee, a Robert Redford look-alike, and Reckson, our Shangaan tracker.

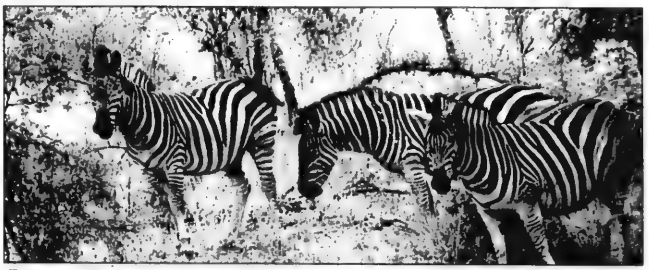
After our first trip, impalas became ho-hum, since there are so many and they are so visible that they become the plat du jour for the more aggressive animals. Nonchalant about these svelte, graceful animals, we wanted bigger and better, and we were rewarded.

A giraffe was gorging on leaves, with its elegant neck stretching for higher branches. A wildebeest and her baby calf, came into view and we saw a few bull elephants – and then the unimaginable – a wild dog. "We hardly ever see them," Lee told us.

I later told my new Kuwaiti friends of our unexpected sight. They too, had had great luck. How is it possible? I wondered. The answer came later. With the newest technology, I learned, whenever there's a sighting, the guides use a car radio to relay the news to a sort of animal central.

It was not surprising that Singita is so well organized. "For the amount we're paying," one guest said, "they have to show us a full complement of animals."

That first evening I fell asleep to the growling of some not-so-far-off beasts and the croaking of frogs.



Zebras are among the many exotic animals you can come across in Singita Game Reserve. [Barbara Kingstone photo]

Awakening to the sound of trickling water from the private outdoor plunge pool made it easier to get up the next morning, although the sun had not yet risen.

During our ride, Reckson, the tracker, sat on a special seat on the car's hood. Only when we got close to certain animals like a lion or cheetah did he climb inside our open vehicle.

That morning, a lioness passed our car so closely that I could have reached out and touched her. The rhinos were wallowing in the mud near a man-made lake and zebras nuzzled each other. The birds in the torchwood and marula trees added more colour to the rainbow palette. A red-billed qwelea fluttered off, as did the very fashionably coloured lilac breasted roller.

In Singita, you can see a dazzling array of wildlife – and I have the photos to prove it.

For travel information about Singita, e-mail: reservations@singita.co.za, or fax: 27 11 234 0535.

Renowned violinist to perform

Mirel Reznic

In 1976, at age 21, Reznic moved to Israel with his sister Miriam Reznic-Wolf, who is his producer and accompanist for this concert.

Working as a security guard, Reznic developed a sideline playing his violin at bar mitzvahs and weddings. His popularity grew, and his repertoire expanded. He served in the army in the entertainment section in 1980-81.

Also in that year, Reznic was invited to travel for the Foreign Ministry. He soon became internationally known as a composer and a performer. Over his career, he has made several recordings, including The Magic Violin of Mirel Reznic-Jewish Gypsy, Amen, Violin and Gypsy Jazz.

Reznic has been fascinated by gypsies since his youth, when he would steal away from his disapproving parents to visit the gypsy encampments outside the city and listen to their music.

In an interview, Reznic said that he believes that gypsies and Jews have a great deal in common, including that they were both persecuted by the Nazis, and that they are both emotional and warm and know how to enjoy life. Jewish folk music has gypsy influence, he said.

The funds raised at the concert will support disabled veterans' rehabilitation and support facilities in Israel.

"Even as the search for peace continues, the casualties haven't stopped," says Toby Feldberg, national executive president of Beit Halochem Canada and chair of the concert.

Beit Halochem centres are located in Jerusalem, Haifa, Tel Aviv and Naharia and offer state-of-the-art rehabilitation facilities for veterans and their families.

"We are committed to provide much-needed funding for the equipment and programs in the four centres," Feldberg says.

She notes that today, in Israel, there are close to 50,000 disabled war veterans that attend Beit Halochem.

Infrared therapy helps relieve pain

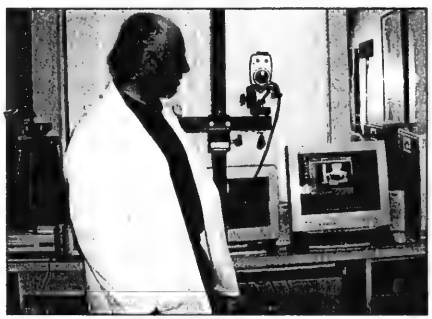
By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Connie Haber, a chiropractor in Pittsburgh, Pa., has discovered a method of relieving chronic pain with lasers.

The procedure uses "breakthrough technology" as the first step in healing and has helped hundreds of patients, Haber says.

Using a photosonic stimulator, cold laser light awakens damaged nerve endings, increasing blood flow to areas of pain.

There are some 12 doctors in the United States and two in Canada who are using this treatment. Chiropractor Toffy Kobrossi, who is in private practice in Toronto, and Harry Pollett, an anesthetist at the Northside General Hospital in North Sidney, N.S., where he operates the hospital's pain clinic, are applying it in Canada with success.



Toffy Kobrossi is seen with the pain-relieving infrared photon stimulator.

"We use a temperature monitor to determine how much laser to apply," Kobrossi says. A light is waved over the painful area, "and the nerve is able to do what it did before it was injured."

The therapy has helped many patients for whom traditional models of treatment have been ineffective. Reflex Sympathetic Dystrophy (RSD), a state of chronic pain caused by soft tissue, bone, or nerve injury, creates pain which has been so severe that in the past very little medical treatment could manage it, Kobrossi says.

"RSD is difficult to treat, but we have been successful and the RSD Society is referring patients to us," he says.

Kobrossi adds that Haber and others have had very few failures but hundreds of successes treating such conditions as diabetic neuritis, peripheral neuropathy, complex regional pain syndromes and other pain disorders.

Haber has successfully treated individuals after a car accident which incapacitated the victim, and has treated people with sports-related injuries as well as with various diseases.

Kobrossi says, "Many disorders of the muscles have also been successfully treated: whiplash, muscle spasm, and fibromyalgia. Other successes have been patients suffering from failed back surgery, TMJ dysfunction, sprains, joint pains, carpal tunnel syndrome, frozen shoulder and others."

He explains that the photon therapy acts in four ways: it provides localized muscle relaxation, serves as an anti-inflammatory, relieves pain and helps heal injured nerves.

"Photon therapy will work in harmony with seniors taking extensive medication and it is helpful for children," Kobrossi adds.

The American Academy of Pain Management has issued a report on this new form of chronic-pain therapy. It states that with more than 500 total infrared exposures, "Overall results were positive, and no deleterious effects were detected in any of the controls or pain patients."

Data analysis and thermography plates are available on the following Web site: www.aamii.com.

New retirement home a family legacy

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Judy Cohen, founder of L'Chaim Retirement Home, set to open this summer, sees the home as her father's legacy.

Her father, who died in 1990, was 53 when she was born. He had lost his first wife in childbirth, and then his second wife and two children in the Holocaust.

"He was special. He instilled in me a love of the elderly; when he died, I knew I had to do something for them," says Cohen, 48, who grew up in Israel.

He had lived in a retirement home for seven years, she says, and it was important to him that he live somewhere "where people spoke his language. Too often, the elderly get forgotten. It can be very difficult for them to move to a strange environment."

In Israel, Cohen says, there is a degree course in retirement home management. "I studied books from that course, and after receiving financial backing, I felt I was ready to pursue my dream."

She chose a location near Sheppard Avenue and Bathurst Street, "because elderly people should be able to remain in their familiar surroundings. If they choose, they should be able to easily get to their own bank and grocery store. We will have counselling services available for those who want to talk to someone while they are adjusting to their new home."

She is keeping occupancy to a maximum of 30 residents because she wants a place in which she will know everyone well. "I want to be their friends. I am fascinated by people's life stories. Their wisdom is priceless. I have called the home L'Chaim, because it is all about life."

The home will have a heimishe environment, she says. "It is their home, and I want it to feel like home. We will all spend Shabbat and Jewish holidays together."

Rooms are private and comfortable, and they are designed so that residents can "age in place. It is a good place for people who enjoy their independence, yet want to be prepared for future changes."

It is essential for seniors to keep busy, Cohen says, and "with that in mind we plan on offering a variety of activities – fitness classes, weekly movies, outings, cultural programs, entertainment, as well as a television lounge and computers with e-mail and Internet access."

For visiting families there will be a play area complete with toys, and a facility for private family functions. "We want everyone to feel at home."

L'Chaim is a member of the Ontario Residential Care Association. For information, call 416-398-7898, or e-mail info@lchaimretirement.com.

I am a youthful Jewish woman, 61, whose favourite season is the fall and is enamoured by the earthy colours of Van Gogh. I appreciate quiet times, long walks, but enjoy a lively family holiday gathering, and the theatre. I would love to meet a man, 60-70, over 5'7", who is sensitive, makes time for others, and understands that life has many shades of grey. Let's build Walden's Pond together. Write to CJN Box #7359.

Jewish gentleman, 62, 5'11", honest, down-to-earth who cherishes true value, would like to meet a sincere lady for long term relationship. Write to P.O. Box 38, Station "T", Toronto, Ont. M6B 3Z9.

A group of secure, independent, mature, divorced menches are looking for women (besherts) 40+ that are a cut above the rest for pleasant social get-togethers with the goal to develop long term relationships through social gatherings. We meet at a congenial setting every 2 weeks. Send information on yourself and maybe a friend to CJN Box #7356.

Friendly!! Enjoy socializing? Call Chai 37+. We'll surprise you. 416-783-7666. Any time.

Israel wins silver in world hockey tournament

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel won its second consecutive medal in international play, hammering Bulgaria 5-1 to take the silver medal at the IIHF World Senior Hockey Championships, Group B, Division II.

Israel rode the strong goaltending of Russian-born Yevgeny Gusin, who had brief stints in the Colonial and East Coast Hockey leagues, and balanced scoring to the second-place finish. Last year, Israel won its first-ever gold medal in IIHF play and the year before that it won silver.

Romania beat the Israelis 7-2 to hand the boys in blue their only defeat of the 2001 tournament – and only their first loss in three years – relegating them to a silver medal match.

"It was a great feeling to win the silver, but we could have won the gold," said defenceman Ron Berman, one of six Canadian-based Israelis to participate in the tournament.

Berman, who plays junior hockey for St. Mikes Buzzers, believes Israel was only one or two players short of winning the gold.

Star forward Max Birbraer, a stalwart on last seasons' gold medal team, was unavailable this year, Berman noted. Birbraer was drafted by New Jersey Devils in the third round of the 2000 NHL entry draft and was playing for the Devils' AHL farm team during the IIHF tournament.

Still, two-thirds of Israel's top line last year was back to contend for the gold. Centre Alon Eizenman of Penn State and winger Sergei Zak, who plays in Europe, teamed to lead the Israeli offensive charge, along with captain Sergei Belo.

First loss in three years for boys in blue

Israel started the tournament strong, rolling over Belgium 5-1 and Mexico 7-1 in what were little more than tune-up games.

Its third game against Yugoslavia, the tournament's second seed, was a different matter. A win guaranteed the Israelis a medal and the game was "hard fought" and tough, Berman said. Israel scored late to edge the Yugoslavs 2-1.

The fourth game pitted Israel versus the host Romanians, who, like the Israelis, were 3-0 at the time. Three thousand fans packed the rink in Bucharest for the game. Israel jumped into a 1-0 lead, but Romania evened the score by the end of the first period.

In the second, Israel ran into penalty trouble and did not play very well, Berman acknowledged. The Romanians responded with an onslaught of goals, vaulting into a 6-2 lead and cruising to a 7-2 win.

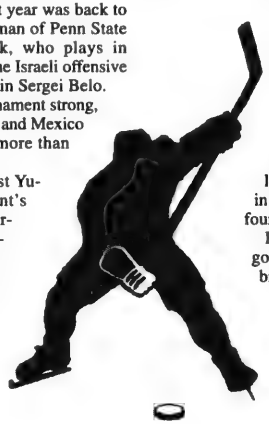
Berman maintained "the score was not indicative of the play."

Relegated to the silver medal match, Israel defeated Bulgaria, with Gusin turning away 36 of 37 shots. Gusin finished as second-best goalkeeper in the tournament.

After Bulgaria jumped into the lead, Edward Raviaga, with an assist by Zak, evened the score on a power play. Just before the end of the opening period, Berman put Israel ahead for good, on a power-play goal, assisted by Ran Oz.

The second frame was scoreless, in a rough, penalty-filled period.

Near the start of the third period, with the teams at equal strength, Sergei Frenkel netted one.



Sergei Belo, with Raviaga's second assist, put Israel ahead 4-1, and in the closing seconds of the game, Oz scored with an assist from Belo to put a convincing finish to the game.

Zak led Israeli scorers in the tournament (he was also last year's leader) with three goals and seven assists. Frenkel, the leading scorer for the Israeli under-18 squad in their recently completed tournament, added four goals and three assists.

Romania downed Yugoslavia 6-1 to take the gold medal, while Yugoslavia settled for the bronze.

For Berman, the silver medal marked his third medal in the last three years playing for Israel's senior team. He's also won an assortment of medals playing for the juniors.

"It was a fun tournament," he said, quite different than he's used to playing in Toronto. On the big ice, there's not much hitting, more penalties and less action than you'd find on NHL-sized rinks, he said.

Joining Berman on the trek to bolster the Israeli lineup were brothers Alon and Erez Eizenman, Ron Soreanu, Frenkel and Daniel Bochner.

Berman is optimistic about the team's prospects in 2002. Frenkel, who was second in team scoring, and Bochner add youth and talent to the team, he said. If Birbraer can be freed up from his AHL duties, Israel has a legitimate shot at a gold, he added.

Bill Gold excelled in many sports

TORONTO — Multi-sport athlete Bill Gold, a fixture on the Toronto sports scene in the prewar period, died recently at age 95.

A former member of many Elizabeth Street (Lizzies) Playground teams, Gold excelled in baseball, softball, basketball, hockey and boxing. As a member of the all-Jewish softball team, Herzl Zion, circa 1930, Gold won an Ontario championship.

Gold and other Jewish athletes of the day often faced anti-Semitic crowds and felt the best way to respond was by winning games. In one year, the Lizzie won championships in hardball, softball, basketball and quoits, a form of horseshoes.

Following his athletic career, Gold spent 35 years in the hotel business, operating several downtown establishments, including the Barclay, a meeting spot for sports figures, entertainers and other colourful characters.

Last July, Gold was honoured by his athletic buddies at the Lizzies Old Timers annual dinner

Martial arts seminar to be held at BJCC

TORONTO — The Kensho Jiu-Jitsu club at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre will open its doors on Sunday, June 10, for a one-day exhibition and seminar on the martial arts.

Instructors will be on hand to demonstrate a variety of fighting techniques, said the club's head instructor, Greg Samuelson. Seminars will be held in jiu-jitsu, sambo (a Russian form of wrestling featuring lots of leg moves), arnis (a stick and knife combat style from the Philippines) and ken-jitsu (a Japanese sword-fighting technique).

Club members and newcomers will be welcome to get on the mat and participate in the seminars, Samuelson said.

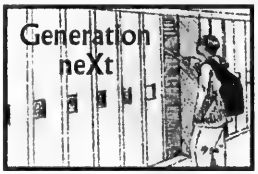
The Kensho Jiu-Jitsu club has 30 students who practise three times a week. For more information, Samuelson can be reached at 416-824-1922.

The Jewish freshman

By GILA ASHTOR

We are small but we are many
We are young but we unite,
To the candle of continuity
You are the flame, and we're the light

Allow me to begin this column by prefacing it with a dose of humility, a sign that what follows shall be a forum for questions, and not a catalogue of answers. This is the first of a two-part series on the role our Jewish identity plays in our futures. With the end of the academic school year fast approaching, the decisions we make promise to impact our lives in more ways than we perhaps ever dared to imagine.



Where do we go from here? What do we do? What is our duty as Jewish youth in secular schools? Until now, our parents have sent us to be educated in the ways they have deemed suitable, whether that be Hebrew schools, public systems, both of the aforementioned, or neither. We have been taught to follow a routine designed for the maintenance of our Jewish heritage. We have never really had to actively determine our own goals and how they relate to our Jewish values. We have never had to create uniform moments to appreciate our Zionism. And we have never had to schedule opportunities to remind ourselves of the roots that strengthen our global presence.

Some of us are heading to York, U of T, Ryerson. Some of us are venturing outward to McGill, Western, McMaster, Carleton, Queens. Some of are exploring Israel, through yeshivas, one-year programs and internships. But all of us are moving on, regardless of where we go and how we get there. All of us are changing, growing and learning to grow with our changes.

As the next several months mark the finale to a memorable high school career of laughs, tears and memories, we must question ourselves just as much as our futures promise to question us. If we want to continue our Jewish lives outside of the classroom, then we must create our spiritual curriculum now, before our leaders are lost and our directions blurred.

More than anything else, we must share with each other the enthusiasm that lifts us, the fear that stumps us, and the natural adolescence that confuses us all. If we fail to act now, then we are inviting a collective demise of the Jewish spirit and the obligation of youths everywhere to embrace and nurture that spirit.

Over the next month, high school students and graduates will be questioned and interviewed about their hopes, dreams and experiences so that through their words we may gain some insight into our own thoughts, feelings and opportunities. If we are successful in our pursuit of answers then we may consider ourselves blessed. And if all we are left with are more questions then we may at least consider ourselves wiser – partly because we challenged reality, and partly because we remained loyal to the doubt and ambivalence that characterizes our age and our potential for change. After all, our excuses for confusion will not be excusable for too much longer. We should enjoy it while we can, and live it in the only way we know how, united and together.

GOAT CHEESE AND LEEK TART

A RECIPE FOR SHAVUOTH

2 tblsp. butter
6 medium leeks, white and 2" of green, sliced
2 tblsp. balsamic vinegar
1/2 tsp salt
1/2 tsp. ground pepper
1/2 cup heavy cream
7 oz. goat cheese, crumbled
1 pre-baked 10" tart shell

Sauté leeks in butter until wilted. Add vinegar, salt and pepper, cover and cook on low heat until leeks are tender (about 30 mins.). Remove lid and increase heat to moderately high, add cream and cook, stirring, about 1 min. Remove pan from heat and let cool.

Spread goat cheese evenly over bottom of tart shell. Spoon leek mixture evenly over cheese. Bake at 350°F until browned on top (about 15 mins.). Serves 6.

About Parenting

CJN is happy to introduce a new monthly column on parenting young children.

Imagine how easy child rearing could be if our kids came with an instruction booklet at their birth. But no definitive manual exists to guide parents through the complicated stages of a child's development, and parenting is, undeniably, one of the most challenging jobs we do!

Books such as Rudolph Dreikurs' Children: the Challenge offer some invaluable tips on parenting. As well, one can always gather some useful parenting techniques from synagogues, hospitals and private parenting courses.

However, the fact remains that often our first-borns bear the brunt of our mistakes, while subsequent children suffer less.

One obvious and seemingly effective way to protect our children from the negative effects of our naiveté is by listening to the advice of those who have raised little ones before.

Unlike our Jewish ancestors, we seem less likely to welcome outside opinions to help us shape our roles as parents. I hear from many mothers of young children that it is stressful to listen to their parents or in-laws give advice on how to raise their children.

What do they know anyway? They have only raised a few healthy "solid citizens," to borrow my pediatrician's label.

In Israel, the kibbutzim raise their children communally. Assistance and advice on teaching and disciplining children seems welcome. So why does sharing advice or commenting on the effectiveness of parenting techniques cause crunched up brows and rolled eyes among some new parents today?

Perhaps it boils down to a person's insecurity about his or her ability to raise a child, or the level of comfort with the choices made thus far.

However, in those exceptional cases where parents are not insecure about their abilities to raise happy and healthy children, they can learn a lot about the dos and don'ts of child rearing from ever-present "may I offer a suggestioners."

In his book, The Wonder of Boys, Michael Gurian argues that community should play a significant role in the upbringing of a boy – I would argue that this could apply to girls as well.

And so, in this first column on parenting issues, I hope to lure the "may I make a suggestioners," secure and insecure parents, as well as their friends, family and neighbours, to share ideas, interests and opinions on parenting – in a community-style parenting column.

Together we can explore the issues that have kept the act of parenting in business from the days of Cain and Abel to the implementation of one-year pregnancy and parental leave from work.

Readers may submit questions or comments to Rebecca Katz at rlkatz@hotmail.com. But she is not a professional, and her advice is not a replacement for medical, legal or any other advice. For serious problems, please consult a professional.

This photo is of worshippers at the Western Wall on Leil Shavuot. Tradition calls upon Jews to study through the night as a remembrance of the moment, more than 3,500 years ago, when the Jewish people received the Torah on Mount Sinai. Rivalry, animosity not helping: Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Although Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz' chest-length beard and salt-and-pepper payes give no hint of his secular Israeli upbringing, his recent lecture at Beth Tzedec Congregation and the interview that preceded it affirmed his broad range of worldly knowledge, with offhand references ranging from Voltaire to machismo.

"There are lots of things I don't agree with, from aleph to taf – from alpha to omega – but as long as we can still talk to each other, that's very important," Rabbi Steinsaltz said in an interview May 13 at Beth Tzedec, North America's largest Conservative synagogue.

Referring to his own lecture that evening at the non-Orthodox venue, Rabbi Steinsaltz – who is internationally renowned for his formidable intellect and storehouse of Judaic knowledge – decried "political fights" that stand in the way of dialogue.

The author of more than 60 books including, so far, 30 volumes of Talmud translation and interpretation, Rabbi Steinsaltz admitted that a certain amount of "politics" is grounded in meaningful issues, but his blunt assessment – tempered slightly by the twinkle behind his wire-rimmed glasses – was that some of the "big leaders... need a good spanking for misbehaving."

The News in Brief

CANADA

Money for Victims

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress president Keith Landy last week presented a $10,000 cheque to Debashish Chakravarti, deputy high commissioner of India. The money was raised by Canada's Jewish community through a special fund set up by CJC in conjunction with UIA Federations Canada and affiliated Jewish community federations across the country following the devastating earthquake in Gujarat.

ISRAEL

Officers Charged

JERUSALEM — Seven Israeli police officers were charged last week with beating a Palestinian detained in connection with the lynching of two Israeli reserve soldiers in Ramallah last October. Israeli media reported that the officers allegedly threw water on the detainee after the beating to remove signs of bleeding and cover up the incident.

Train Service

JERUSALEM — Israel's rail authority has inaugurated a double-decker passenger train that will serve suburban communities surrounding Tel Aviv. The train can seat 505 people and reach speeds of 87 miles per hour.

WORLD

Cemetery Vandalized

WARSAW — Vandals toppled 39 gravestones at the Auschwitz cemetery last week, including the stone of Szymon Kluger, the last Jewish resident of the Polish town. Several stones reportedly were destroyed, and the cemetery's walls were defaced with anti-Semitic slogans, swastikas and an image of a gallows with a Star of David hanging from it.

Rabbi Killed

DETROIT — A prominent Michigan rabbi was killed in a car crash earlier this month after a pre-dawn visit to the grave of the Lubavitcher Rebbe, Menachem Mendel Schneerson. A leader of the Lubavitch movement in Michigan, Rabbi Yitschak Meir Kagan, 59, was driving to New York for his flight home when his car collided with a van.

New President

PARIS — Roger Cukierman, 63, a banker, has been elected president of CRIF, the umbrella group of secular French Jewish organizations. Cukierman replaces Henri Hajdenberg, who is completing his two-year term. Cukierman narrowly defeated Roger Benaroch, the first Sephardi candidate to run for the top non-religious post in a community with a growing Sephardi majority.

Kalejs Charges

SYDNEY, Australia — A hearing has opened here to determine whether Konrad Kalejs should be extradited to his native Latvia to face genocide charges. For years, Kalejs has faced charges of being involved in the wartime slaughter of civilians when he served as an officer in Latvia's pro-Nazi Arajs Kommando. The militia is held directly responsible for the deaths of some 100,000 civilians, including 30,000 Jews, between 1941 and 1943.

Polish Memorial?

WARSAW — Poland has agreed to buy a plot of land as a memorial for Jews massacred by their Polish neighbors in 1941 in the town of Jedwabne. The memorial is set to be completed by July, after government officials negotiated with the owner of land adjacent to a grave that is believed to hold the remains of the 1,600 victims.

Dutch Donation

AMSTERDAM — Three Dutch insurance companies have donated $4.2 million to a nonprofit foundation helping impoverished Holocaust survivors in California. The money from Aegon, Fortis and ING America will fund the California Humanitarian Foundation for Holocaust Survivors.

New Chairman

NEW YORK — The United Jewish Communities has offered its top volunteer position to the president of UJA-Federation of Greater New York, according to a report. James Tisch of New York was reportedly asked to replace fellow philanthropist Charles Bronfman as chairman of the board, but has not yet responded.

Bills Could Affect Relations

WASHINGTON — Two pieces of legislation being considered in the U.S. Congress could change the way the United States interacts with Israel's neighbours.

The first bill, sponsored by New York Rep. Gary Ackerman, would require the State Department to ascertain whether the Palestinian Authority is complying with peace agreements with Israel – and, if not, to impose sanctions.

Also under consideration is a bill to limit non-humanitarian aid to Lebanon if it does not secure its border with Israel.

Ackerman's bill, the Middle East Peace Commitments Act, would add teeth to current State Department reports that chronicle Palestinian actions but do not judge their compliance with peace agreements, and do not impose consequences.

His bill "goes a mile further," said Ackerman. "This helps us all to see clearly what the facts are and whether or not there have been violations."

Ackerman said legislation is needed to impose sanctions because he does not believe the State Department will do so on its own.

Tax credit plan divides Jewish Liberal MPPs

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ontario's surprise announcement this month of provincial tax credits for parents of children in independent and private, faith-based schools is threatening to put one of the province's two Jewish Liberal MPPs on a collision course with many of his constituents, and the other in direct conflict with his leader.

David Caplan, MPP for Don Valley East, says he's against the initiative "because it's the first step toward a voucher system."

And Monte Kwinter, who represents the heavily Jewish riding of York Centre, supports the measure – with reservations – putting him at odds with Liberal leader Dalton McGuinty.

Canadian Jewish Congress met last week with McGuinty to address his fierce opposition to the credit.

Some of the harshest criticism of the Equity in Education Tax Credit came from the Liberal leader, who at one point promised to kill the measure should his party come to power.

McGuinty initially said he will fight the plan "tooth and nail" and called it "a new voucher program."

The two sides more or less agreed to disagree following last week's 30-minute meeting.

Ed Morgan, CJC's Ontario region chair, said McGuinty has softened his view that private schools are only for the rich, and that while McGuinty recognizes the unfairness religious schools face, he cannot commit to funding independent education when the public system is so strapped.

"He acknowledged a point of principle and fairness for religious schools but not for non-religious, independent schools," Morgan said. "He said this was not a tax credit, but a voucher."

Later, McGuinty told reporters his party will allow "nothing, no initiative of any kind, to put [the public system] ar risk, and this one surely does."

Caplan echoed that view, telling The CJN: "It's a voucher. You can dress it up or term it anything you want, but it's really a down payment, a first step toward a voucher."

While acknowledging an "unfairness" when it comes to education funding, Caplan said there are "other ways" to address inequities, such as religious schools affiliating with public boards.

He said he knows his views are at odds with those of most of his Jewish constituents. "I believe this is wrong in principle, and they really go against the values I hold." However, "most" of the general feedback he's received has been against the measure, he said.

Anti-funding arguments flawed: Epstein

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The arguments against funding for faith-based schools are flawed, says Seymour Epstein.

Epstein, executive director of UJA FEDERATION Board of Jewish Education, said there is no evidence in any jurisdiction that funding will diminish the quality of public education in any way.

"My sense is that the effect on the public system will be positive and that this is the future of public school education in Ontario," Epstein said.

"Public schools should be reflective of the population.

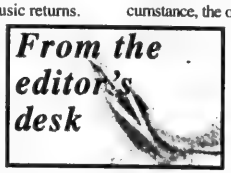
Two masters of music

The unique period in the Jewish calendar of counting the Omer from Pesach to Shavuot, which tradition calls on us to observe with some of the trappings of mourning, is "interrupted" on Lag b'Omer, the 33rd day in the counting cycle.

After Lag b'Omer, music returns.



In that vein, I want to bring readers' attention to two recently released works of two very special, very gifted, Canadian masters of music.

Louis Danto is one of the most venerated cantors on earth. His voice, gentle manner and rare lyric sensitivity are renowned in synagogues, theatre stages and opera houses throughout the world.

Danto's musical gift was established when he was but a child in Poland. At an early age, he studied in music academies in Minsk and Lodz.

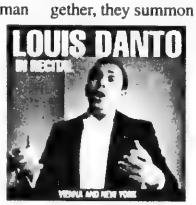
Eventually, his skills and pursuit of constantly higher levels of musical excellence took him to Rome where he learned what was to be his unique trademark signature, bel canto singing.

Now, the cantor emeritus at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue in Toronto, Danto is still the embodiment, in this generation, of the rich Jewish musical heritage that has its roots in Eastern Europe but whose branches span across diverse continents and cultures.

Louis Danto in Recital, Vienna and New York is Danto's 21st recording. It offers to listeners the impressive technical musical skills and remarkable interpretative abilities of the man when he was a much younger singer.

The concerts by the young tenor – at Carnegie Hall in New York and the Mahler Symphony Hall in Vienna – were recorded in 1961. Through a quirk of circumstance, the original tapes only recently came to light and were re-mastered with the aid of digital technology.

Aficionados of Danto's splendid voice and stylings will take special delight in the recording because it provides them with a trip back in time, as it were, to hear the cantor as he sounded some four decades ago. Those unfamiliar with Danto's talents will find in the recording an example of unparalleled voice control; he demonstrates subtlety and nuance in every phrase. Moreover, he demonstrates his musical mastery in 49 different songs sung in a number of languages: Italian, Russian, German and Hebrew.



This recording is an important work – almost an archive of musical history and a pleasurable gem. The voice remains in one's memory long after the disc stops turning.

Toward the Sun is an extraordinary testament to the wondrous musical talents of Srul Irving Glick and his colleagues, soprano Valerie Siren and pianist Cecilia Ignatieff, violinist marina Dancheva and cellist Grigory Goldberg.

The recording offers 20 different songs organized according to three themes, or "song cycles." It is a poignant series of works that grips the listener's heart and throat, sung hauntingly by Valerie Siren.

The first "cycle," entitled We are Children Just the Same, is a compilation of five poems that Glick has set to music. The poems were written by three young boys while imprisoned at Terezin during World War II. The boys were part of a group who, during their internment, published a newspaper called Vedem. This cycle of five songs was commissioned in honour of the 70th birthday of George Brady, one of the young internees.

The second "cycle," South of North, is an evocative journey along a trail of eight "nature" poems written by Richard Outram. Glick's music is a perfect partner to the poetry.

The third cycle brings together seven songs from the love poetry of The Song of Songs. Glick's music, Siren's voice and the accompanying instrumentation provide a sensuous auditory experience.

Toward the Sun is familiar and even comforting territory for Glick fans. He pools together prodigious composing skills with a vibrant, bold imagination; together, they summon forth evocations of ancient and modern sounds.

Glick has been described as "one of Canada's most prominent composers."

His compositions have been performed around the world. In 1993, he received a Governor General's medal and the following year was appointed a Member of the Order of Canada for his "outstanding achievement for service to Canada and to humanity at large."

Louis Danto and Srul Irving Glick are bona fide Canadian treasures, but their music and their souls reach farther. They add splendour to the culture of the world.

These two recordings show us why.

LAG B'OMER CELEBRATION: Members of the Petah Tikva Synagogue auctioned off memorial candles that were lit in the names of tzaddikim. This is a Tangerian tradition, which the congregation has continued over the years, said Robin Benmergui, current president of the synagogue. Benmergui, whose father Moses was also president of the synagogue, said all sorts of items are donated and auctioned off – from cakes to candelabras – and $35,000 to $40,000 is raised every year with hiloulas and singing. Conservative rabbis to convene in Toronto

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A major rabbinical conference will take place here from June 3 to 7 when approximately 350 members of the Conservative movement's Rabbinical Assembly (RA) gather for the international umbrella organization's 101st annual convention.

"This is the beginning of a new century for the Rabbinical Assembly," said Rabbi Vernon Kurtz, the assembly's Toronto-born, Chicago-based president, in a phone interview last week. "The needs and concerns of world Jewry are on our minds in a very real sense, with Israel being at the forefront."

Among the delegates will be a contingent of Masorti rabbis from Israel, along with colleagues from North America, South America and Europe.

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl

The convention, which is being held for the most part at the Inn on the Park Hotel, kicks off on the Sunday afternoon with a two-hour session on challenges facing Israel in the new century.

The session is expected to address issues of culture, religion, law, politics, international relations and military strategy, said Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, who is chairing the convention along with co-chair Rabbi Lionel Moses of Shaare Zion Congregation in Montreal.

That evening Rabbi Harold Kushner, best known as author of When Bad Things Happen to Good People, will speak at a session entitled Celebrating the Publication of a New Chumash. Etz Hayim, the new Conservative Torah commentary that is expected to replace the 65-year-old Pentateuch and Haftorahs (commonly known as the Hertz Chumash), will be previewed at the convention.

Its publication is "an important milestone for North American Jewish life," said Rabbi Frydman-Kohl. The text will become "the primary instrument of public education in Conservative synagogues for the next generation."

The new Chumash is linked to the convention's theme of Teaching Torah in a New Century, featured in a number of sessions including a "master class" led by Rabbi Ismar Schorsch, chancellor of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America.

There will also be opportunities for the public to study with biblical and rabbinics scholars on the Tuesday evening, at five different locations – the Bloor JCC, Kolel, Adath Israel Congregation, Beth Tikvah Synagogue, and Associated Hebrew Schools' Kamin branch in Thornhill. The event is being organized as the RA's "gift to the Toronto Jewish community," said Rabbi Kurtz.

"This is very unusual. We've tried to do different things [at different conventions]. Last year in Philadelphia we did social action projects," he said.

Among the other main events is a lecture by Irwin Cotler, MP and professor of international law, on Human Rights and the Rule of Law, to be held at Beth Tzedec on June 4. He is expected to discuss the tensions between human rights and Jewish interests. The same event will honour Manny Batshaw, Judge Abraham Lieff and Judy Feld Carr as outstanding Canadians.

On the last day, the convention will feature a dialogue on rabbinic leadership, with three rabbis – Howard Joseph, Jeffrey Salkin and Alan Silverstein – representing the Orthodox, Reform and Conservative denominations respectively. Rabbi Joseph is spiritual leader of the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue in Montreal; Rabbi Salkin, of Long Island, N.Y., is the author of Putting God on the Guest List; and Rabbi Silverstein, of Caldwell, N.J., is a past RA president. Among the issues, according to Rabbi Frydman-Kohl are questions like what possibilities exist to work together, and what impediments stand in the way.

Rabbi Kurtz said the convention will also be an opportunity for rabbis to share personal and professional issues ranging from dual-career households to the proliferation of non-pulpit career opportunities.

In fact, he noted, the RA has established a task force for its growing contingent of non-pulpit members, to determine how to service them.

Implications for pulpit rabbis and Conservative congregations are also an issue. "Many congregations are looking for rabbis. We do not have enough Conservative rabbis to fill those positions," said Rabbi Kurtz, speaking from New York, where he was attending the Jewish Theological Seminary graduation. Of 29 rabbis being ordained this year, he noted, 13 are entering pulpit positions.

"We are encouraging that there be more Conservative rabbis, period," he said, adding that there is also discussion about how to encourage the pulpit rabbinate.

"We're like the front line," said Rabbi Frydman-Kohl. "We really want to create an opportunity [at the convention] for rabbis to talk with each other. We wanted to create a space where not only could they study, but they could share what they're doing that's working, and what they're doing that's troubling them."

Jews facing new challenges, says Chief Rabbi

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Whereas the challenge for Jews in the 20th century was to return to Israel, the challenge for Jews in the 21st century is to be united and to stand proud and strong as Jews, British Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks told a large gathering in Toronto on May 10.

British Chief Rabbi Sacks

"The challenge of the 20th century was bringing Jews back to Israel. The challenge of the 21st century is bringing Jews back to Judaism," Rabbi Sacks said to rousing applause at a recent free public lecture at the Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

Although we lived in "remarkable times" whose wonders the ancient prophets like Jeremiah and Ezekiel "could only dream of," Rabbi Sacks lamented the high rate of Jewish intermarriage and the low level of Jewish learning among the general Jewish population.

"Many Jewish children know very little about Judaism," he said. "Some can't even name the five books of Moses. Did our ancestors live and die as Jews, and pray as Jews, so that we their descendants could cease to be Jewish?"

The Jews became slaves in Egypt after Joseph's brothers sold him into slavery, Rabbi Sacks recounted, and the Jews later lost the First and Second Temples and were twice forced into exile because of their unfortunate predilection for civil war.

"The Jews were busier fighting each other than fighting the Romans outside. The Rabbis said the only reason that Jerusalem was destroyed was because the Jews couldn't live together in peace.

"We were attacked by the greatest empires of the world. Every one of them has ceased to exist and we're still here. The greatest empires of the world can't threaten the Jewish people. There is only one people who can threaten the Jewish people, and that is the Jews."

Interspersing his lecture with lively anecdotes, Rabbi Sacks told one story based on the fact that Theodor Herzl and Sigmund Freud both lived briefly on the same street in Vienna. What if they had met?

"Herzl would have said, 'I have this dream of a Jewish state,' and Freud would have said, 'How long have you had this dream? Lie down on my couch and I will cure you of this dream.' And Herzl would have lied down on his couch and Freud would have cured him of his dream.

"Baruch Hashem, we are the people who were never cured of our dream."

For Jews, the challenge of the 21st century is different than that of the 20th, he said. "You helped to build a land, now help to build a people."

Since the audience included many members of the Mizrachi Organization of Canada, which had co-sponsored the talk with Shaarei Shomayim, Rabbi Sacks occasionally addressed them in particular:

"I want you to tell your friends in Israel, forget about how many seats you have in the Knesset. Forget about how many portfolios you have in the government. Nothing could be more irrelevant. Right now, the task is not politics, it's social. You have hundreds of thousands of Jewish children who know nothing about Yiddishkeit."

Similarly, he urged the audience to listen less to divisive voices from the political right or left, or from any particular branch or faction of Judaism, and more to "Rabbeinu shel Olam." As well, he said, the Jews should pay more attention to the universal, secular wisdom known in Hebrew as chochmah, not just the particularized Jewish wisdom of Torah.

"Our sages said very simply, 'There is wisdom among non-Jews.' Believe it!" he said. "It's because of Torah that we are Jews; it is because of chochmah that we are part of the universal project called Mankind."

Rabbi Sacks recalled speaking with British Prime Minister Tony Blair at a Jewish communal dinner where most of the participants were not wearing yamulkes.

"He [Blair] said, 'Jonathan, should I wear a yamulke when I'm speaking?' I said, 'Prime Minister, as a personal favour to me, wear a yamulke.'

"So he gets up and makes a speech – a d'var Torah on the parshah. I looked at my wife and said, 'We've converted the prime minister, now we have to convert the Jews!'

"Friends – wake up already. Don't be embarrassed. Be proud to be a Jew."

During his four days in Toronto, Rabbi Sacks spoke to students and educators at Ulpanot Orot, Or Chaim, CHAT and other Jewish day schools and junior high schools. He also met with representatives of Canadian Jewish Congress, the Va'ad Ha-Rabonim, and a group of academics from York University and the University of Toronto.

Besides the public lecture at Shaarei Shomayim, Rabbi Sacks spoke several times to that congregation on Shabbat. Before leaving Canada the following day, he also visited Niagara Falls.

Rabbi warns about Christian 'Trojan Horse'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Michael Skobac has spent years tangling with Christian missionaries, trying to undo their proselytizing efforts.

As head of Jews for Judaism, he's become adept at recognizing the tactics of Christian evangelists who have developed sophisticated means to recruit new converts. He's also very familiar with their jargon and the way they communicate, both to each other and to the outside world, including their potential recruits.

That's why the rabbi contacted The CJN about an article (April 19) concerning two Christian groups that support the State of Israel, one of which actively assists European Jews to make aliyah by ferrying them to embarkation points in an "Exobus" program.

Rabbi Skobac believes the group, Christians for Israel, has a "hidden agenda" whose ultimate goal is to bring Jews to Jesus.

Dean Bye, executive-director of the group's Canadian branch, rejects that suggestion. He says the group is motivated out of a sense of regret for past injustices done to Jews in the name of Christianity, and now wishes to "be a blessing" to Jews and Israel.

Rabbi Skobac's evidence is based on his interpretation of the group's statements, publications and analysis of the group's pronouncements.

He compares the organization's tactics to the Trojan Horse, ostensibly offering a gift of friendship to Israel but at heart wishing to convince Jews to accept Jesus as the messiah.

> Group has a 'hidden agenda'

Bye, for his part, says he understands Rabbi Skobac's concerns, but he maintains that with Christians for Israel, what you see is what you get.

"First and foremost, for the last 2,000 years, the hidden agenda that Christianity presented itself with has hurt our Jewish brethren… We're not about evangelizing the Jews," he said.

Christians for Israel is concerned primarily with educating other Christians and secondarily in helping the Jews return to their ancient homeland, and "to be a blessing to Israel, to bring comfort to Israel," he said.

Yet those words cause Rabbi Skobac's antennae to pop up. He lauds the group's good works, like helping in the aliyah of Russian Jews to Israel, but he believes they are trying "to convert the Jews by being nice to Jews. You can't criticize them for being nice… but there's an agenda behind it and it's not good for us."

Rabbi Skobac insists that to fully understand groups like Christians for Israel, you must understand the means by which they operate.

In South America, he said, Christian groups are building medical centres in Jewish neighbourhoods as a means of evangelizing Jews. In other locations, English as a second language classes are offered as a forum in which to better preach the gospel.

"These Christian projects are done ultimately with the goal of being a vehicle to bring Jews to Jesus. I'm not negating what they are doing. I just want it to be clear they have an agenda," Rabbi Skobac said.

Groups like Christians for Israel want to see Jews back in Israel "to fulfill a prophetic destiny and hasten Jesus' coming and embrace Jesus," he said.

Rabbi Skobac's views are backed by Mark Sanders, a former evangelical Christian who has converted to Judaism.

Sanders, who "spent 20 years of my life in that movement," said Christians for Israel employs a methodology similar to evangelical groups, with various "code words" giving the game away.

"Christians," Sanders said, "believe their spiritual destiny is tied to developments in Israel and to bringing Jews into the Christian fold."

Although he was not fully familiar with the Canadian branch of Christians for Israel, he rejected suggestions the group has not embraced the missionary ideal.

Behind closed doors, Christian groups' ultimate goal is to convert Jews, he said.

When he was working towards that goal in the 1980s and '90s, "we believed Jews were blind and that the blindness was removed when they came to Jesus," he said.

Bye rejects suggestions the group is evangelizing Jews. In fact, he said, "we have been criticized within Christian circles [by those] who think we should try to reach people for Jesus, and we've been criticized by some for not giving New Testaments away. That's not our purpose. We are there to give comfort. We have to do that without condition."

Rabbi Skobac believes the group hopes to attract interest in its works from Russian Jews and entice them into a Christian life by virtue of their good works and moral rectitude.

Bye acknowledged that while he doesn't advocate proselytization, he would readily explain the source of his hope and motivation if someone asked him about it.

"I would not turn away anyone who's interested in my Christian faith. I would not try to convert them, but to explain it to them," he said.

For Rabbi Skobac, those words no doubt are enough to prompt wariness. As he put it, "honour them but verify. Be a little bit cautious… Be aware of their agenda."

Manley missed the opportunity

An eight-day visit to the Middle East would be exhausting for anyone. We well understand and appreciate therefore that the pressures and demands of the jam-packed agenda of Canada's foreign minister John Manley earlier this month, visiting three countries and four governments, must have left him fatigued and probably a bit frazzled too.

Manley visited Egypt, Jordan, the Palestinian Authority (PA) and Israel and consulted with the area's respective leaders. It was his first visit to the region as foreign minister. We commend his initiative. And indeed there were some aspects of Manley's visit that warrant commendation: He extended an official invitation, a significant gesture of friendship, to Israel's head of state, President Moshe Katsav, and he offered Canada as a venue for bilateral negotiations between the Palestinians and the Israelis.

But there was also a key aspect of the foreign minister's visit that warrants criticism. Seizing conveniently on the Mitchell Commission's report regarding settlements, Manley hectored Israel about a matter which is, in all truth, a straw man in terms of the current violence. In so doing, he actually retarded rather than advanced the possibility of imminently ending the horrible bloodshed.

"The continuation of the settlements must stop. That is what needs to be done for there to be a basis, in order to move forward with any peace process," Manley told the Israelis at a press conference.

But his prescription is wrong. Progress in the peace process is not contingent on the settlements. Regardless of one's opinions on the substantive, legal, pragmatic, moral, biblical or any other merits of those settlements, they are not the issue at the heart of the current violence.

Honest people know that this round of violence began as a tactical decision by Yasser Arafat after the exposure of his false game by former U.S. president Bill Clinton at Camp David last July. Arafat did not mention the settlements as the ignition for the fiery violence he let loose in late September. His excuse then, of course, was the Temple Mount walk by Ariel Sharon.

The reference in the Mitchell Commission report to settlements is a PA smokescreen obscuring the truth, a sham "justification" for Arafat's duplicitous, deadly direction of Palestinian affairs. Numerous times in the Oslo process, Arafat committed to negotiating, not terrorizing, over the fate of the settlements. When he speaks to his people about liberation from the "occupation," he refers explicitly to the "occupation" that began in 1948 with the creation of the State of Israel. Every Palestinian and every Israeli knows exactly what Arafat means.

Manley does too. But by ignoring this truth, by reinforcing the false link between the violence and the settlements, he let Arafat off the hook and merely encouraged him to continue his violent ways.

Manley thus missed an important opportunity to truly "move forward with any peace process."

Why is there no cry of horror?

Much of the media have a pronounced anti-Israel bias. It is certainly the obligation of the Jewish media to try to correct the imbalance which characterizes a great deal of reporting. There are many questions which go begging to be asked and yet are not.

In reference to the murder of Naftali Lantzkoren in April, I have to ask how can a 14-year-old Arab walk over to 14-year-old boys and murder them? Who taught this child such hatred and brutality, to be capable of such an act? Who provided him with the explosives and helped to bind them around his body so that he might kill himself and others? Why isn't there a unified cry of horror by every nation that loves its children against the people who would train, equip and poison the mind of a child in this manner?

Funding opponents are wrong

The opponents of the new government initiative to alleviate religious discrimination in education funding are "throwing the baby out with the bathwater." They see the partial elimination of this inequity as an attack on the public school system, when in fact, it seeks to address a problem as old as Confederation.

While funding non-religious independent schools has nothing to do with human rights and equality, the tax credit is a good first step in trying to adhere to our international human rights commitments and eliminate religious discrimination in education funding. Instead of removing funding from Catholics, this government has chosen the high road of multiculturalism and started to extend funding (or give tax breaks) to non-Catholics.

Protecting religious minorities in Canada is something we should be proud of, not rail against.

CJC should rethink funding

Before the Canadian Jewish Congress is overcome by celebration, I would suggest it reflect and take a more farsighted view on the effects of having tax dollars support for private and religious schools. It only stands to reason that before long, religious and ethnic divisions will be reinforced as more and more people send their kids to schools teaching one religion and dogma often not favourable to Judaism and Israel.

Surely in a multicultural society such as ours, it would behoove Congress to join with other religious and private schools in lobbying the government to bring equality to school funding by removing all tax credits, such as they have done in Quebec and Newfoundland.

A well-funded public school system can only benefit the country and ultimately produce a well-educated and thoughtful population, open to ideas and tolerant of all religious persuasions.

Disturbed by 'Clinton' event

The Canadian Society for Vad Vashem is holding a fund-raiser in Toronto on June 25. With the goal of the event to build another Holocaust memorial, the cost per ticket is $250. Former U.S. president Bill Clinton will receive a fee of about $100,000 to make a speech. Whether this fee is in Canadian or U.S. dollars is not clear.

I find this information disturbing on two counts: Firstly, I find it wrong to pay such an amount to a man who showed continual moral turpitude while in office. He faced impeachment for perjury and abuse of office and only escaped indictment with a deal, where he gave up his right to practise law for five years and paid a fine.

Secondly, to build at enormous expense, yet another Holocaust memorial, is unwarranted. We must not and will not forget the Holocaust, but there seems to have developed a competition between cities to see which can have the most impressive and expensive monument. The monies would be better spent on Jewish charities. Jewish exhibits should focus on Jewish achievements, which we can take pride in seeing. We should not always concentrate on our role as victims. Similarly, Jewish studies and literature should have a broader outlook and not be so Holocaust oriented.

Commendations to CJC

I found it heartwarming to read, that Keith Landy, incoming national president of the Canadian Jewish Congress, plans to place affordable housing for the elderly, child poverty and the status of women on his agenda, in addition to items of specific concern to the Jewish community (CJN, April 26).

The concept of "tikkun olâm" is shared by all sectors of our community, and the issues Landy will confront affect us all as Canadians. Poverty is increasing throughout society, and is felt particularly by the most helpless: children and the elderly.

As members of the Older Women's Network, we are involved in promoting awareness of the vulnerability of women who face poverty and isolation as they age. OWN and other like-minded organizations defend the rights of those no longer able to stand alone.

We wish Landy every success in his endeavours to share responsibility for safeguarding the rights of the elderly to affordable housing and the rights of the young to a brighter future.

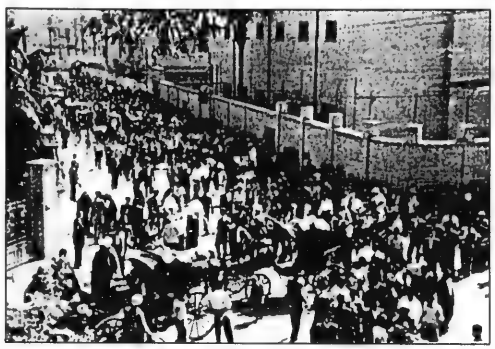
Perspectives

60 years since Shavuot pogrom in Baghdad

By AVNER MEIRI

If you just mention the word farhud to Iraqi Jews, you will send a chill down their spine.

For hundreds of years, the Jews of Iraq lived peacefully, enjoying the freedom to practise their religion and their culture. Synagogues and private Jewish schools were evident throughout Baghdad and other major cities. Most of the merchants in Baghdad were Jews, and important finance and administrative positions in the government were held by Jewish intellectuals.



Thousands of Jews crowd the Meir Tweiq Synagogue in Baghdad in March 1950 to register to leave the country.

The seeds of hatred were planted in the mid-1930s, when a group of politicians and army leaders were inspired by Haj Amin Al-Husseini, the mufti of Jerusalem, who sought to be allied with Nazi Germany. He was expelled from Palestine by the British authorities because of his hostile activities against the Jews and the British.

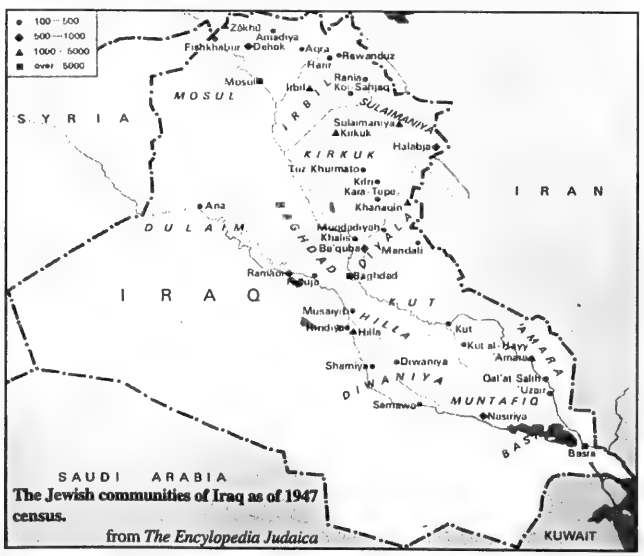
On April 1, 1941, the military junta of the Iraqi army (nicknamed the Golden Square) attempted a coup, with the co-operation of pro-Nazi politicians, took control in Baghdad and appointed Rashid Ali Al-Gailani as prime minister. The pro-British prime minister, Nori Al-Saaid, and the Prince Regent Abdul-Ilah fled to Amman, Jordan.

At the beginning of May, the new regime declared war on Britain, a war which lasted until the end of the month. During April and May 1941, the Jews were terrorized by the militia, Kataib-Al Shabab and other youth movements. But surprisingly, nothing serious happened to the Jews during this period, except that 10 Jews were killed by a mob in the northern village of Sandor.

The coup failed, and Rashid Al-Gailani, his followers and the leader of the uprising fled across the border to Iran.

Meanwhile, for unexplained reasons, the British army came very close to the capital but failed to enter the city. This created a vacuum; in fact, there was no government in Baghdad at that time.

On June 1, 1941, the first day of Shavuot, the Regent Abdul-Ilah and his company were to arrive at Baghdad's airport from Amman.



The Jewish communities of Iraq as of 1947 census.

from The Encylopedia Judaica

The Jews of Iraq were in a festive mood for the holiday, as well as being joyful about the end of the uprising. Some decided to go to the airport and participate in the ceremony welcoming the regent.

That day, the Jews were attacked by a mob of soldiers from defeated army units and other hooligans. Public buses were ordered to stop at the main streets of Al-Rashid and Ghazi, and Jews were ordered to step out. After taking their money and jewelry, the mob started beating them. The police watched but did not interfere. Some officers urged the mob to kill the Jews.

The merchants closed their shops in a frenzy, but as the streets were cleared, rioters started attacking Jewish homes and shops. Soldiers fired machine guns at Jews who were trying to escape by jumping from rooftop to rooftop. Fortunately, since the houses were attached on all sides, it was easy to move from one house to the other. A few Jewish homes and businesses were set on fire. The situation deteriorated by the hour.

The Jews of Baghdad had been anticipating a certain amount of rioting, but had not expected a pogrom. As a result, they were not prepared to defend themselves. They used what weapons they had: some threw stones, hot boiled water and oil on the rioters, while others fought with household tools. The result was that there were some mob casualties.

At midnight the situation became calm; the gunshots and the crying ceased. Most of the Jewish people in the city went to bed exhausted but kept their clothes on, ready to escape across the rooftops once more in case there was a need.

The next day, gunshots erupted again. Thousands of looters from the outskirts of Baghdad came with their wives and children to take part in the farhud.

The turning point in the rioting came when the city's wealthy and respected Muslim families, fearing for their lives and property, urged the regent to intervene immediately. Early that afternoon, the government radio announced the appointment of Jamil El-Madfaai as the new prime minister; he immediately proclaimed a city-wide curfew.

A Kurdish unit from the Iraqi army, loyal to the regent, was sent to keep order. Unaware of the announcement, the mob continued to loot and kill Jews, until the unit swept the streets in their armoured cars, shooting hundreds of looters and sending the rest fleeing for their lives. In a few hours, the streets were empty, except for the patrolling ambulances and security cars.

A week later, it was announced that during the days of the farhud, 179 Jews had been killed by the rioters, over 600 wounded and an unknown number of women had been raped. At least 1,000 homes, 2,500 shops and four synagogues had been plundered.

It should be mentioned at this point that many Muslims tried to protect their Jewish neighbours, and even risked their lives in doing so. Among those Righteous Gentiles who endangered their lives to save our own family of 11 in a mixed Jewish and Muslim neighbourhood, were Haj Mousa Al-Javad and his four sons. It is really to them that we owe thanks for our lives with the sincerest respect.

The new government in Iraq expressed its regret and took certain measures to reassure the wounded Jewish community. Many leaders of the attackers were arrested, sentenced to death and hanged in public. The four Golden Square officers who had carried out the coup d'état were executed. The mufti and Rashid Ali Al-Gailani were tried in absentia and sentenced to death.

The mass grave at the Baghdad Jewish cemetery of the victims of the pogrom. The cemetery has since been destroyed.

The pogrom of 1941 shook the Jews of Iraq by shattering their hopes for a future in that country. Some of them tried to assimilate into Arab society, assuming that loyalty to the state would prevent similar attacks in the future. Others immigrated to India, Europe and the United States.

In addition, the underground Zionist movement was revitalized and hundreds of young people from high school and their parents left for Palestine. With the help of the Jewish Brigade during World War II, many of them were successfully smuggled there.

The wave of illegal immigrant activity to Palestine continued after the war. With the establishment of the State of Israel in 1948, thousands of young men and women crossed the border to Iran, Turkey and Jordan, endangering their lives to reach their homeland.

When the Iraqi government realized it could not stop the mass flight, it legalized the Jewish exodus. On March 2, 1950, the minister of the interior, Saleh Jabir, introduced a bill in the Iraqi Parliament that allowed the Jewish people to leave the country providing they renounced their citizenship. Some 93 percent of the Iraqi Jews registered to do so.

By early 1952, 108,000 people had been lifted to Israel in operations Ezra and Nehemia, in addition to the 25,000 who had left illegally. Today, there are fewer than 50 Iraqi Jews left in Baghdad, most of them too sick and old to leave their birthplace.

The ultimate voyeur

I am writing this column as a personal reaction to the impending execution of Timothy McVeigh, the convicted Oklahoma bomber, who took almost 168 lives some years ago. After many years of incarceration, he said that he preferred death to spending more time in jail. Now his wish will be fulfilled.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Following good Jewish tradition, I am not a supporter of the death penalty. As many readers probably know, the rabbis of old took a very clear stance regarding the many instances in which the Torah demanded that the culprit be executed in one way or another. Different times and circumstances, they argued, made the application of Torah law in this instance very difficult, if not impossible. But since they felt that they had to respect the law, they managed not to apply it by asking the required witnesses questions that they were unlikely to answer properly.

For instance, they would ask where the moon was standing at the time of the killing, which was said to have taken place at night. Needless to say, the witness was not necessarily aware of certain external conditions and was unable to answer this and similar questions appropriately. The rabbis then concluded that in the absence of proper testimony, the two reliable witnesses required by the Torah for the conviction were not at hand – and thus the law demanding execution was effectively bypassed.

The State of Israel has followed this tradition and has abolished the death penalty for instances of genocide. The execution of Adolf Eichmann was the one exception.

Unlike Canada, the United States still knows the death penalty; many states have maintained it and have applied it frequently. President George W. Bush's home state of Texas probably leads the country in this dubious honour.

It appears that the execution of McVeigh will be thrown open to a sizable group of voyeurs who are not among the required witnesses, and that fills me with dismay. I thought the days were long past when public excutions were routine. Do the authorities have to satisfy the morbid feelings of anger and revenge – which have at least the sheen of legitimacy – to the extent that they will abort the common tradition of privacy and respect for life, even that of a murderer like McVeigh?

The fact that McVeigh himself probably wants as much publicity as possible is one of the reasons that his desire should be disregarded and thereby, too, public dignity will be maintained. Catering to the desires of people who want to watch the last-minute contortions of another human being before his soul departs is nothing but disgusting, and society should never cater to it.

An unwritten but important commandment

Shavout is a time for us to celebrate the receiving of the Torah. The Hollywood version reduces it to Moses climbing down Mount Sinai with the Ten Commandments. Seeing as how most do not come close to observing even half of those commandments, I have always thought that we should have been presented with 100 commandments, with the hopes of obeying at least 20 of them. If that had been the case, I can name a few that I would have added.

Darcie Richler in Halifax

Let me share a story with you…

Recently, my father and I went out for a late dinner at a local restaurant. (I've withheld the name to protect the not-so-innocent and prevent a potential lawsuit!) While dining, I noticed that there was a water spout constantly running into a slate sink for the sole purpose of allowing diners to fill their own exotic glass of water. Some might have totally ignored this waste, but in me, it sparked fury.

After a few minutes of boiling inside, I asked the manager about it. He said that the customers "think it's pretty" and all the locations of this particular restaurant chain did it. When asked about whether or not the restaurant cares about how much water is wasted by this, the manager chuckled and said, "This is what the owners of the Canadian operation want; it's deliberate." (The supply is turned off when the restaurant is closed between 1 and 7 a.m.)

Imagine. What kind of restaurant would waste so much water? In a time when many of us are realizing that our natural resources and water supplies are vulnerable or unstable, how could people be so blatantly obtuse? Of course, in addition to the sinful, continuous flow of the water, there was the additional burden on the city's sewage treatment system.

It is a privilege to live in a place like Canada that has not yet been faced with the adversity of not having natural resources. Unfortunately, though, many think that because the environmental problems here are not classified as serious as they are in other countries, we have the right to abuse them. While we are not at the point of desperation with water as Israel is, we could be headed there soon – in fact, much sooner than we think. This goes for many other natural resources, too.

Sustainable development, which we can only hope for within the next few decades, is not reached easily. It is, however, the only possible situation that we will be facing. People should not consider that they must forgo something to attain sustainable development. It is not like opportunity lost – we are actually gaining in pursuing sustainable development.

My interest in environmental issues comes from many places, but much of it is from one source: Prof. Owen Hertzman at Dalhousie University. Dalhousie and the APJSF will lose perhaps one of their best professors/mentors this May when Hertzman moves back to his hometown of Vancouver, B.C.

Hertzman has been an inspiration not only to the Jewish students on campus but also to all the Dalhousie students he has taught. We have all been fortunate to have had such a wonderful mentor. His class has opened many an eye to key environmental problems, and moreover, he has taken the course to a higher level in showing us how to facilitate change.

This year, the most important lesson that I took from his class was to never take "no" for an answer. Hertzman has constantly maintained that it is up to us to be articulate about what we are concerned with and bring forth our activism with a positive voice. That is why I will be pursuing this restaurant until I get the answer that I want.

I urge all of you to tackle an environmental issue that interests you. At some point, we all must see what is happening to the environment. For me, that point was in my environmental problem solving course.

We need to realize that humans are not the centre of the universe. This does not mean that you have to hug trees and stop showering, but consider how you can alter your ecological footprint to better our planet. Sometimes small gestures like taking shorter showers and composting food are what make a difference, but remember that it all adds up no matter what side you are on. Which side would you prefer, the waster or the preserver?

Here's another commandment to observe: Thou Shalt Not Waste.

Chag Samayach.

CJC plenary student sessions need change

Every three years, the Canadian Jewish Congress holds a plenary assembly, in which delegates representing various organizations vote on resolutions and attend sessions with well-known speakers.

Bryan Harzykawski in Winnipeg

This year, the CJC was very interested in getting students involved in the voting and discussions. As a result, I was able to attend the event which took place in Toronto on May 6 and 7.

As the convention drew closer, my excitement grew. I was looking forward to the opportunity to share ideas with other students and to listen to people speak about topics ranging from the Middle East conflict to student issues. I hoped I would be able to get another view on how Jewish student associations in other cities work.

I arrived at the plenary just as the youth forum started. As I was sitting and listening to the student panellists, I began to realize that this day might not be the exciting experience that I hoped it would be.

I have some concerns about the plenary, and in particular, about the student sessions.

One of the problems I had with the session titled Issues facing Jewish Youth, was that all of the panellists except one were from Ontario. There was no Western Canadian representation on the panel and there definitely needed to be. The main issue discussed was student apathy and I had a very different perspective on this from several of the panellists. The majority of personal experiences that were shared did not relate to how the Jewish Student Association is run in Winnipeg.

Many adults thought this session gave much insight into the problems facing students; they now think that they are finally in touch with us. Unfortunately, this is far from the case. While the panellists all made good points, all they did was speak about student apathy. Almost no ideas were given on what we can do about it.

I have known that students are apathetic when it comes to Jewish programming since I was in my first year of BBYO in Grade 9. I therefore feel that at this plenary, what we needed to do was to split the students up into groups, share program ideas and talk about how we can target those who are uninterested. This will hopefully happen in the future. Yet at this session, none of that occurred – a major problem with the CJC's attempt to get students involved.

Another session, called The Middle East/Jerusalem, I thought showed promise, as I imagined that we would be discussing the facts of the conflict and learning about some of the history and issues facing the Middle East. Unfortunately, this was not the case. I do not think a lot of people know how students are dealing with the Arab-Israeli conflict. I can only speak about the feeling here in Winnipeg, but most students do not feel comfortable hearing about how great Israel is and would rather attend a function that addresses the issue of peace.

While the session had three excellent speakers, to my disappointment, they preached to the audience about the greatness of the Holy Land. I would have rather seen a session where we talked about the possibility for peace, what it would take to achieve peace and other issues relating to both sides of this conflict.

Another session I attended, called Media Matters, was very interesting. Among other things, the session addressed the media's take on the Middle East conflict. There were four speakers who spoke for about 10 to 15 minutes, made a few very interesting points and then took questions for 20 to 30 minutes. Other sessions had the speakers talking for 30 to 40 minutes, which left no time for discussion. If the entire convention took the format of the Media Matters discussion, we would have seen many more ideas shared.

I am writing this to be constructive, and I hope that members of the CJC read this and realize that if they want students to become involved in the plenary, they need to take a very different approach in 2004.

Israel's peace camp fragmented by intifadah

The baleful events of the past 10 months – the collapse of the Camp David summit, the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising in less than two decades, and the virtual disintegration of the Oslo peace process – have fragmented Israel's Jewish peace movement.

Sheldon Kirshner in Israel

So says Ephraim Ya'ar, director of Tel Aviv University's Tami Steinmetz Centre for Peace Research. Ya'ar, who has studied these developments closely, believes that the peace camp has essentially splintered into three distinct groups.

The first group, commanding the allegiance of 40 percent to 50 percent of Israeli peaceniks, has reached the depressing conclusion that the Palestinian Authority (PA) is not truly interested in coming to terms with Israel. Having lost hope in Oslo, it has adopted the rhetoric of the right: the PA is not a genuine partner, the Palestinians cannot be trusted, Ehud Barak's Camp David concessions were perceived as a sign of weakness by Yasser Arafat, the Palestinians' ultimate goal is Israel's destruction.

The second group, with approximately the same level of grassroots backing, came to the bitter realization that the Palestinian leadership had not negotiated in good faith. Nevertheless, it hews to the belief that Israel has no alternative but to renew talks with the Palestinians when and if the intifadah ends.

The third group, consisting of a few hundred or thousand radicals on the fringes of Israeli society, is more convinced than ever that only a secular, democratic state, in place of Israel, can bring peace and stability to the region.

As Israel fights a low-level but escalating war of attrition with the Palestinians, the mood in the country regarding Palestinian intentions has definitely hardened.

Such is the lack of trust toward the Palestinians that increasing numbers of Israelis believe that the intifadah was launched not to wring yet more concessions out of Israel, but to gradually undermine it. As a corollary, the majority of Israelis back Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's policy of deploying greater military force against the PA.

Judging by the latest results of the Peace Index survey, compiled by Ya'ar's institute, support for Oslo has reached a nadir.

By his reckoning, no more than 35 percent of Israeli Jews still embrace Oslo. The Peace Index reached a highwater mark of 55 percent in 1995, shortly after Yigal Amir's assassination of Yitzhak Rabin.

In general, Ya'ar said, Oslo diehards tend to be secular, Ashkenazi, well-to-do and better educated.

Although most Israeli Jews blame Arafat for the breakdown of the Camp David summit, Barak is not immune to criticism either.

Israelis disillusioned by Barak's handling of the Camp David talks claim that he went too far, too fast; that he was secretive and did not consult with his ministers; and that he erred in trying to resolve thorny final status issues, such as the status of eastern Jerusalem and the Palestinian refugee imbroglio, in one fell swoop.

In other words, Barak should not have staked the outcome of such important negotiations on a hubristic assessment that he, and he alone, could successfully settle these long-standing problems.

According to Ya'ar's data, 50 percent of the peace camp is of the view that Israel was responsible for the failure of the Camp David summit.

Although he offered Arafat a generous territorial package (at least 90 percent of the West Bank and all of Gaza), Barak kept strengthening settlements beyond the Green Line, initiated military operations against the PA, and, in imposing closures and curfews, was not sufficiently sensitive to the Palestinians' economic plight.

Ya'ar acknowledges that the prevailing mood among Israeli Jews is that the Palestinians seek to destroy Israel in stages. But, personally, he thinks that the PA has pragmatically accepted Israel's existence. "The old idea of throwing Jews into the sea is dead and is not a realistic option. The PA's strategy is to drive the best possible bargain."

The Palestinians, he said, liken the intifadah to a war of independence. "For Jews, it's like the Arab Revolt of 1936 to 1939."

The PA assumes that Israel, lacking the will and the stamina, will ultimately give in to Palestinian demands. "This assumption is very wrong," observed Ya'ar, noting that the PA is committing yet another mistake by allowing attacks inside Israel's pre-1967 borders. "It's counter-productive."

Since the eruption of the intifadah, Arafat's image among Israeli Jews has taken a nose dive. "Eighty percent of Israelis see Arafat more as a terrorist than a statesman," said Ya'ar. And, he added, numerous Israeli Jews now believe that he is incapable of signing a end-of-conflict deal with Israel.

Though he remains a believer in the possibility of peace with the Palestinians, Ya'ar is wary. "The fact that the PA wants to restart talks on the basis of concessions they rejected at Camp David shows they're not serious."

"It's the million dollar question," mused Didi Remez, Peace Now's spokesperson, wondering out loud whether Oslo is dead and buried. "But I'm not sure whether it's a relevant question. The real question is whether there is a future for a two-state solution. My answer: there is no other option."

In common with virtually every peacenik in Israel, Remez is resigned to the fact that peace is not around the corner. "Final status talks, unfortunately, are off the table." Before a resumption of negotiations, there must be a ceasefire and a period of confidence building. As well, he noted, the Palestinians must reaffirm their commitment to territorial partition. "This is critical if Israeli public opinion is to support talks again."

Remez argues that Sharon's preference for interim accords is just another way of lengthening Israel's occupation of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip and further inflaming the situation. And, he claimed, the settlements discourage Palestinians from believing that real peace is possible. Peace Now's official view is that a ceasefire should be followed by a settlement freeze.

The status quo in the disputed territories, he argued, is not in Israel's best interests. "The occupation weakens Palestinian moderates and strengthens radical Palestinians."

Lambasting Arafat for having resorted to violence, Remez confessed he is no longer certain what his objectives are. "It's beyond me what the Palestinians are trying to do today, but I still believe that mainstream Palestinian thinking is aimed at a two-state solution based on the 1967 border."

Over the short term, he observed, the intifadah has "severely damaged" the dream of peaceful coexistence between Israelis and Arabs."

Several months ago, the peace camp was in disarray, he conceded. "Now we're in the process of rebuilding and regrouping. The Zionist peace camp is not divided."

Israeli public opinion, he holds, is currently evenly split between rightists, leftists and swing voters.

If a truce is achieved, negotiations should begin at the point they left off at Taba in January. "Israelis are ready for widespread concessions." As for unilateral separation, it won't work unless Israel withdraws to the 1967 lines.

The confusion that swamped the peace camp after Camp David and the intifadah has passed, said Galia Golan, a Hebrew University political science professor and a Peace Now activist. "But our task is very much more difficult today," she said, citing Sharon's election as prime minister.

In her opinion, the PA has not given up on the idea of a two-state solution, "but many, many Palestinians want a binational state."

Disagreeing with those who suggest that the PA's secret agenda turns on Israel's eventual destruction, Golan retorted, "If they were hewing to the 'theory of stages,' they would have accepted Barak's offer last year."

To Golan, the key issue facing both sides is the "right of return," the right of Palestinian refugees to go back to their homes in what is now Israel. "My impression is that there was a great deal of progress on this at Taba." However this problem is solved, Golan is certain that Israel will never accept a massive repatriation of Palestinians.

Anat Maor, a Meretz party member of the Knesset, retains a bedrock conviction in the concept of Arab-Israeli coexistence, recent setbacks notwithstanding."I am more than sure that, without peace, both sides will lose. I haven't lost my faith."

Apportioning responsibility for the current impasse, Maor blamed Arafat and Barak – Arafat for having started the intifadah and Barak for having reduced Camp David into an all-or-nothing game.

Maor warned that if the PA presses for the right of return, the peace process will wither away. "Israel cannot, and never will, agree to the right of return. It is an absurd request, to give our country to Arafat."

Depictions of God

Encountering God in Judaism*, by Neil Gillman, Jewish Lights Publishing, $21.95 (US).

Books
Bernard Baskin

How does the Tanach (Hebrew Scriptures) depict God? The numerous images and portrayals are often contradictory. God is by turns destructive and creative, vain and modest, subtle and naïve, ruthless and tender, powerful and powerless. God is a source of peace and also a mighty warrior.

Gillman, professor of Jewish philosophy at the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York, in examining God's complex and dynamic inner life, explores not only Hebrew Scriptures, but also rabbinic literature, midrash, the prayer book and Jewish theology. The result is a wide-ranging analysis filled with insight and learning. It is daring and original, yet lucid, concise and accessible to the general reader.

God does not change; however, our images and conceptions of God do change for the reason that Maimonides suggested more than 800 years ago, the author says. Maimonides insisted that all human images of God are, of necessity, metaphors. They are subjective expressions of our own experience, and if we humans change, then certainly our understanding and portrayal of God must undergo alteration.

A striking example Gillman gives is the account of Abraham pleading for the wicked inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah. In the course of this famous encounter, God deliberates, is conflicted, has feelings, invites consultation, is willing to change the Divine plan, is open to negotiation, and needs to be true to previous commitments. Above all, God has an intense relationship with an infallible but determined human being.

Gillman then refers to the ideas of Abraham Heschel, noted philosopher and teacher, who emphasizes God's vulnerability. God may be all powerful, Heschel says, but in the biblical narrative – in fact, throughout history as Judaism understands it – God's hopes and dreams for human society are invariably frustrated. He never gets the kind of world for which He yearns. He encounters constant human rebellion. The Divine response includes frustration, despair and anger, always mixed with infinite yearning that somehow, sometime, erring humans will follow His way.

Divine frustration is an inevitable consequence of God's own commitment to human freedom. If human beings have been given the freedom to make choices, then these choices can often be wrong, cruel and unfortunate. God may rage over human wickedness, plead for justice and compassion on earth, or choose to punish or to reward, but He has surrendered the power to interfere with the course of human history.

In the latter portion of this slender volume, the author briefly and clearly discusses God's role in creation, revelation and redemption, and indicates how Jewish thinkers as diverse as Maimonides, Rozensweig, Heschel and Mordecai Kaplan have understood these terms and translated them into useful ideas for our generation.

Finally, Gillman asserts that if our ancestors felt free to change or reinterpret some of Judaism's classic images of God, then we are entitled to do the same. For, remember, that what we are changing is not God but rather our own evolving images that flow from our own historical and cultural context.

"If the ancients could say that, to them, God could not be experienced as purely punitive, then we can say, for example, that God should not be portrayed exclusively in male terms," Gillman writes.

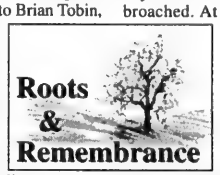
This book, part of the ambitious publishing project, The Way Into..., is intellectually compelling, worthy of study and reflection.

Coming to our census

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Excuse the pun, but it's time that we Canadians come to our senses about the federal census.

Genealogists, historians and other researchers across Canada have begun a letter-writing campaign to Brian Tobin, the Minister of Industry, who is responsible for all matters pertaining to Statistics Canada and the census. The issue is that the government, citing concerns of privacy and confidentiality, intends not to release any Canadian censuses after 1901, the last year for which a census is available.



This month being a census month, the issue is being widely discussed in genealogical circles. Petitions are rushing through cyberspace. Researchers are being urged to lobby the government to change its position through legislative change.

The problem, in brief, is that the government painted itself into a corner in 1905, when Saskatchewan and Alberta became provinces. At that time, the federal government promised that all census materials would henceforth be kept private and confidential, a promise that was legislatively enacted in 1919.

"No one understood the implications," says Irving Abella, past president of the Canadian Historical Association, who describes census data as "absolutely essential" to historians.

"Americans release their census data after 70 years and the British after 75 years," says Abella. "We're recommending 90 years... so it's not like anyone's confidentiality would be broached. At present, we're the only country in the Western world that does not allow access."

Glen Eker, a genealogical-historical-legal researcher based in Hamilton, Ont., has spent years poring over census data, compiling lists of Jewish residents across Canada from 1851 through 1901, and even later for the territory of Newfoundland.

"The census is one of the most important tools for researchers, because you can find entire outlines of families, with names, ages, birthplaces and birthdates," he says.

Many censuses already released include details of religion and ethnicity, Eker says; Jews are identified as "Jewish, Hebrew, Mosaic, Israelite and other terms, like Sons of Israel."

An expert panel assembled by the government has strongly urged the government to amend the law to enable it to release each census 92 years after it was taken. Thus, the 1911 census would be accessible to the public within a couple of years. But the government has given no indication that it intends to take action any time soon.

"If the United States, which is always so concerned about privacy, can release its censuses up to 1930, then we can release ours to 1911," Eker says. "There's no earth-shattering information in there, but it helps people trace their families, so we should have the right to see it."

The census data is "of vital importance to genealogists" and there is "strong grassroots support" for release of historical censuses, says Garry Stein, vice-president of the Jewish Genealogical Society of Canada, which has urged its members to write to Chief Statistician Dr. Ivan Fellegi, at Statistics Canada in Ottawa. Stein is also a board member of the International Association of Jewish Genealogical Societies, which has also expressed concern.

The Jewish Top Ten

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

It is the original Top Ten List.

On Monday morning, The Ten Commandments will be read from the Torah to mark the first day of Shavuot. According to Virtual Jerusalem, "When the Ten Commandments were given at Mount Sinai, the course of human history was changed forever. No document has influenced the course of civilization like the Bible, and it can be argued that of all the contents the Bible, these 10 laws have been the single most influential section." [207.168.91.4/vjholidays/shavuot/ten.htm] Today, the Ten Commandments on the Web.

You can read the Ten Commandments in Exodus 20:1 or if you prefer, you can have them sung to you at ORT's wonderful Web site Navigating the Bible [bible.ort.org/books/torahd5.asp?action=displaypage&book=2&chapter=20&verse=2&portion=17].

Robin Treistman has a thought provoking essay titled The Ten... in which Treistman tries to shatter some myths [www.wzo.org.il/encountr/tencom.htm]. For example, Treistman argues that the phrase Ten Commandments is actually a poor translation of the Hebrew "Aseret Hadibrot – The Ten Statements." So what makes these statements so special? "Jewish tradition holds that inside of – or included in – these Ten Statements is the entire Torah. In other words, the Ten Statements are actually Ten Categories into which each of the 613 Torah commandments falls. Name any commandment and I'll bet we can figure out where it belongs: Holidays, which sanctify time like Shabbat (the Sabbath) belong in the fourth commandment about observing Shabbat. Dealing honestly in business falls under not bearing false testimony..."

Rabbi Anchelle Perl bursts another misconception. Thanks to countless paintings and the unforgettable image of Charlton Heston atop Mount Sinai, we are all familiar with the Ten Commandments etched on those two tablets, square on the bottom, round on the top. Not quite, says Rabbi Perl [www.rabbiperl.com/holidays/shavuos.htm]. He quotes the Talmud to argue that the tablets were actually square on top. He says Judaism has a responsibility to depict accurately one of its most important symbols.

For many more sites about the Ten Commandments and Shavuot, check out Beith HaChatulim [www.geocities.com/Heartland/Hills/1259/shavlinks.htm] and Maven [www.maven.co.il/subjects.asp?S=126].

There are a few Ten Commandments sites that focus on kids. The Jewish Theological Seminary site has a large poster celebrating the giving of the Torah that kids can print out and colour [learn.jtsa.edu/topics/kids/shavuot_together/poster.shtml]. The TorahTots site has a comprehensive look at the preparation the Israelites went through to receive the Torah, in addition to an explanation of the Ten Commandments geared toward kids [www.torahtots.com/parsha/shmos/yitro2.htm].

It seems that there are many children who would have done well to study the TorahTots site. Richard Lederer has scoured the world for some of the most outrageous things kids have written about the Bible. Here are some biblical bloopers – actual mistakes made by young scholars about the Exodus and the Ten Commandments [pw1.netcom.com/~rlederer/arcblpr.htm]. "Moses led the Hebrews to the Red Sea, where they made unleavened bread, which is bread made without any ingredients. The Egyptians were all drowned in the dessert. Afterwards, Moses went up on Mount Cyanide to get the Ten Amendments. The First Commandment was when Eve told Adam to eat the apple. The Fifth Commandment is humour thy father and mother. The Seventh Commandment is thou shalt not admit adultery."

The Ten Commandments have not only become central to Judaism; they have woven themselves into our popular culture. Many sites even have lists of lists [www.exxnet.com/geni/tencom.htm] of "new" commandments. I leave you with a sampling:

Ten Commandments of Lobbying: "Take your friends where you find them. Today's opponent may be tomorrow's ally." [www.mokids.org/commandments.htm]

Ten Commandments of Fabric Shopping: "Thou shall never take your husband." [www.madbbs.com/users/elkwar/ten_commandments_of_fabric_shopp.htm]

Ten Commandments for Sane Living: "Strike a balance between work and play... Nobody ever said on their death bed, 'I wish I had spent more time in the office.'" [www.stevenharper.com/ten.htm]

Have a very happy holiday.

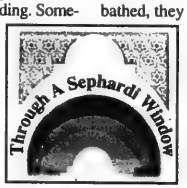
Henna, a joyous celebration

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Most people's association with the word henna has to do with some organic hair colour. But for a Sephardi, a henna is a most joyous pre-wedding celebration. Sephardim of all origins will put on these lavish occasions before a wedding. Sometimes the event is so elaborate that it will eclipse the main event.



At a henna, the main feature is the kallah (bride). Traditionally, her henna dress would have been prepared by her mother much earlier. The henna dress is much more a work of art than it is a garment. Beginning with a foundation of velvet fabric in royal hues of purple, crimson red or midnight blue, delicate floral designs are embroidered using 24-karat gold twine. No two henna dresses are alike. The embroidery is the pride of the bride's mother who patiently and painstakingly stitched it herself.

In this robe the bride would be wed – this was her wedding dress. The Jews, as a result of western influence, only slowly adopted the white wedding gowns we see today.

On the henna night the women of the family would first escort the bride to the mikvah, or ritual bath. There as she bathed, they would throw rose petals on her and sprinkle her with rose water.

On her return, the final fitting of the henna dress would take place. Mother and mother-in-law, aunts, sisters and even neighbours would be honoured in assisting her in this dressing. Each one not only doted on the bride but also bestowed a blessing on her at the same time. While the women were busy with the bride, the men would patiently wait.

When she was finally ready, with much pageantry and fanfare, including musical accompaniment and song, the father of the bride would lead her in her debut. More rose petals would shower the bride as she, veiled and resplendent in her gown of gold and velvet, was paraded amongst those assembled. The destination was a much-adorned throne and canopy.

Sitting like a queen, she was then presented with gifts. From mother and father, she received her trousseau – linens, towels, tablecloths and napkins, all monogrammed, of course. The groom and his parents would present her with jewelry. Each piece was brought out on a pillow and ceremoniously placed on the bride with much pomp and music.

Food and drink would be followed with delectable sweets of pastry stuffed with almonds. A henna would continue late into the night. Passersby would hear the music and commotion and be expected to enter and offer their good wishes.

The henna dresses of old have become century-old heirlooms; some are even displayed in museums. But hennas today are still very much practised, as they are a rich and integral part of the wedding. Pictures and videos of the henna now record this marvelous tradition. If you have been lucky to have been part of a henna, you know that this event will be forever etched in your memory.

Bible contest a mix of competition, 'edu-tainment'

By REBECCA NADLER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The highest scorers in the Canadian National Bible Contest recently came to Montreal for two days of competition and "edu-tainment."

More than 600 students participated in the contest in different regions earlier in the year, and 209 participated in the contest in Montreal.

The Canadian National Bible Contest includes students from schools affiliated with the Orthodox, Conservative, Reform and Zionist movements, as well as many community-based schools.

"This is a book we all share and cherish; that is what brings us all together," said Leah Levi, the educational co-ordinator of Congregation Emanu-El, in Victoria. "Coming to the national competition gives our kids chevrah. Our kids have a chance to meet other Jewish kids and they love the learning."

Students studied up to 76 set chapters of the Bible for months preceding the Montreal contest. When the competitors arrived on the first day, the halls were filled with excitement as participants greeted friends they had not seen since last year's competition. They tested each other, and questions were shared by all.

"The level of knowledge exhibited by the students was astounding," said Shawn Aster, a former winner of the contest who is now a PhD candidate in Bible at the University of Pennsylvania.

Aster, along with Silvia Eilath of the UJA FEDERATION Board of Jewish Education in Toronto, prepared this year's tests.

"Some of the students who did not even make it to the semi-finals know the books of the Bible they studied better than most doctoral students in Bible. The finalists know the material far better than most Bible professors," Aster said.

One new aspect of the contest this year was that eight former winners ran most of the activities over the two days. The former winners of the Canadian contest have represented Canada in the International Bible Contest for Jewish Youth, held annually in Israel as a televised event for Israel Independence Day. They served as role models for the students and told of their experiences in Israel.

"A culture of Bible-contest winners has been created," one parent said, "where kids meet other kids who have similar interests, and are also very knowledgeable about the Bible. They only see each other once a year at the Canadian Bible Contest, but they keep in touch all year."

Alexandra Rotstein, a former winner, said, "One of the great pluses of the contest is that the students learn to value and respect Torah study and they have so much fun doing it."

"This was my first time in the competition," said Aviva Goldstein, a Grade 5 student from Netivot Hatorah in Toronto. "I didn't win anything, but I loved being here and I really loved learning all the material with my mother."

Each year, the awards ceremony where the winners are announced is the culmination of months of study by the students.

The winners of this year's National Bible contest are:

Supplementary school division: First place, Benjamin Farrow, Temple Israel, Ottawa; second, Zoey Green, and third, Graham Litman, both from Congregation Emanu-El, Victoria.

Day school divisions, grades 5 and 6: First place, Menachem Gelkolf, Chatan Yisrael and David Pellow, of Netivot Hatorah, Toronto. Second, Katie Shamash, from Hebrew Foundation School, Montreal, and third, Moshe Cohen, of Hebrew Academy of Montreal.

Grades 7 and 8 division: first place, Hillel Nadler from Netivot Hatorah; second, Malki Feldman, and third, Shoshanna Warner, both from Eitz Chaim in Toronto.

The winners of the high school division were all students at Yeshivat Or Chaim/Ulpanat Orot Schools of Toronto: Yaakov Frydman Kohl, first place, Moshe Halpern, second, and Rebecca Winter, third.

Frydman Kohl will represent Canada in the international contest in Israel next year.

The contest is co-sponsored by Bronfman Jewish Education Centre in Montreal, the UJA FEDERATION Board of Jewish Education in Toronto, the Canadian Zionist Federation and the Jewish National Fund.

Canadian Friends bridges the gap

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Gillian Sinclair, executive assistant at Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University, has bridged the distance to Israel.

When she meets Bar-Ilan students who are on a scholarship provided by her organization, she says, "It makes my work real, and brings the students closer. Many scholarship students would not otherwise have been able to continue their education."

Bar-Ilan University, located on a seven-acre campus in Ramat Gan and in five regional colleges across the country, has 26,000 students, and offers 6,000 courses in natural, social and life sciences, humanities, Jewish studies and law. Under construction, is a 75-acre extension to the main campus.

Among other job responsibilities, Sinclair, who has been there 7½ years, does bookkeeping for the national office – there is an office in Montreal as well – co-ordinates events, writes fund-raising proposals, prepares the annual newsletter which goes across the country, and oversees the direct mail campaign.

Gillian Sinclair

Originally from Montreal, Sinclair graduated from the Jewish studies program at York University. "I wanted to work in the Jewish community, and this position became available while I was still in school.

"It was not something I wanted to pass up, so I took the job and finished my degree while I was working. It was a wise decision," she says.

The mandate for Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University, she says, is to raise funds for the school and although it is Jerry Tollinsky, the national executive director, who does the actual fund-raising, "I enjoy interacting with donors and various other people in the community.

"Two years ago, I went to a conference for fund-raising staff at Bar-Ilan in Israel, and I walked through buildings that were made possible because of our work. It was an incredible feeling to see first-hand what we really do.

"With e-mail, we are in constant contact with people in Israel and the rest of Canada; the distance between us all has been taken away."

With so many responsibilities, her job "is a big commitment, but the work is very worthwhile," says the mother of two boys ages six and three.

"It is sometimes a challenge. I have to co-ordinate carpools and make arrangements for when the kids are off school, but they have been good to me here.

"I have my hands in many different areas, and it is exciting work. I get to know every aspect of the organization. It is a great way to spend the day."

'Ten Commandments' handed down at lecture

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

TORONTO — Rabbi Elyse Goldstein recently handed down the Ten Commandments of Spiritual Parenting to a crowd of parents and grandparents at the Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

Sponsored by the Women's League for Conservative Judiasm, Canadian Seaway Branch, and the Beth Tikvah Sisterhood, the one-hour lecture centred on how parents can inculcate Jewish spiritual values in their children.

The hope, says Rabbi Goldstein, is that these children, and generations of Jewish children thereafter will grow up with a strong sense of their Jewish identity.

Rabbi Goldstein began by earnestly telling the audience that there are many ways of being Jewish.

"There is no one way of being Jewish, and though we want our kids to adopt our ways, we can't expect them to," she explained.

"But we do want to give our children a panoply of good values they can choose from when they want to make their choice."

Rabbi Goldstein went on to define Jewish spirituality as "the balance between awe, reverence, or respect for God and comfy, cozy love and warmth.

"It is important to inculcate in children the sense that life is bigger than we are, but balance it with the comforting activities and smells of being Jewish, such as challah baking in the oven on erev Shabbat, or sitting down to eat Shabbat dinner with family," she said.

A mother of three boys, ages 7, 9, and 11, Rabbi Goldstein illustrated her commandments with personal anecdotes of how she and her husband of 14 years, Baruch Sienna, have tried to instill Jewish values into their children.

Rabbi Goldstein

Originally a 10 week course – which will be repeated next winter, Goldstein's talk was described by a number of audience members as "inspiring" and "enlightening."

Key points of the lecture included:

• Parents cannot give spirituality, but they can share theirs, and act as role models. "Do things to show your kids that you are a spiritual person, and give kids the opportunity to act out their feelings," said Rabbi Goldstein.

• Talk about God using age-appropriate stories and teachings.

• Make "I have enough" your mantra. "Teach your kids the value of tzedakah and the idea of individual responsibility, that one person can make a difference." Children learn to have enough when they are always sharing.

• Talk about death. "Talking about death gives children the chance to understand it as part of the life cycle. God has not let us down when someone dies – He is comforting us in the hopsital or the shivah house."

• Establish a spiritual routine. "Do something that gives children a sense of Jewish security with their parents and an awareness of time." Rabbi Goldstein suggests marking an upcoming Jewish holiday with certain smells, sounds, sights, or activities.

• Judiasm expects parents to be teachers and guides. "You have to be the target so that when your kids have questions, they can shoot them at you."

Rabbi Goldstein summed up by saying that spirituality is a family journey.

"Kids are part of that journey, and should be involved in discussions about Judiasm," she said.

King, Westheimer to headline Bonds 50th anniversary dinner

TORONTO — CNN talk show host Larry King and sex therapist Dr. Ruth Westheimer are scheduled to headline the 50th anniversary gala dinner of State of Israel Bonds in Canada on June 3 at Toronto's National Trade Centre (100 Princes Blvd. at Exhibition Place).

Dr. Westheimer

The event will benefit United Way of Greater Toronto's Tomorrow Fund and Jewish Family and Child Service's Poverty Initiative.

Larry King

Also slated to appear is internationally acclaimed violinist Sonio Jon, and King is scheduled to interview Westheimer for broadcast.

The event is co-chaired by Toronto business figures Lawrence Bloomberg, George Cohon and Paul Godfrey.

The dinner will also recognize Israel Bonds' many Ontario chairpersons and national officers.

Over the last 50 years, more than $24 billion in investment capital has been raised through Israel Bonds investments. The funds have been allocated to key public-sector infrastructure developments in Israel, including water desalination, hydro-electric and highway projects.

The Tomorrow Fund is the United Way's endowment, while the JF&CS Poverty Initiative offers emergency rent assistance and provides early intervention for children from financially disadvantaged families.

Jewish state struggling for survival, says author

By REBECCA KATZ
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Imagine a grade six civic textbook in an Israeli school that opens with the history of the Greeks and Romans and does not mention the Jewish people until its seventh chapter.

Or textbooks that are increasingly being redirected from their "classical Zionist teachings of history," to more conventional western or "world" historical thought.

When the Jews are mentioned in the textbook, "They appear exactly how they looked from the Greek perspective," said Yoram Hazony, the president of the Shalem Center in Israel, in his recent lecture, The Struggle for Israel's Soul, before a full house at Holy Blossom Temple.

The result?

"What you end up with is no coherent Jewish narrative," said the former advisor to Benjamin Netanyahu.

In his most recent book, The Jewish State: The Struggle for Israel's Soul, Hazony examines the deterioration of Israel's soul by the "Israeli cultural mainstream" and post-Zionist influences.

According to Hazony, these influences include the media, some members of the Supreme Court, and a group of intellectuals who, through their rewriting of laws and history, are effectively destabilizing the "spirit" of the Israeli Defence Force and omitting important events in Jewish history from the new middle school curriculum.

Children in Israel will not learn about "the great drama, the history of the Jewish people anymore," Hazony said. Nor will there be a chapter about "the longing of the Jews for their homeland," he added.

"Today, that chapter is gone."

Hazony attributes these omissions in the textbooks to the beliefs of opponents of the old curriculum that its teachings "[lead] toward nationalist education, and possibly in the end to fascism."

> Jews busy arguing over borderlines

While describing the shortcomings of the new middle school curriculum, the 36-year-old father of seven children listed a host of Jewish events and experiences that no longer exist on the pages of Israeli history textbooks.

In one textbook, "almost all the references to the Diaspora have been eliminated because there is no corporate identity of the Jewish people in exile," Hazony said.

He elicited some gasps of surprise from the audience when he said, "There is no reference to the Warsaw Ghetto uprising, the underground operations are summed up in four [Hebrew] words.

"It does not once, in its 300 pages, refer to Chaim Weitzmann during the period that he was head of the Zionist organization, that he was the leading statesman in the world trying to establish a Jewish state from 1921 to 1946."

Hazony alleges that one of the greatest catastrophes of the deterioration of Israel's soul is that while these parts of Jewish experience, history, and heritage are being erased from the curriculum, Jews around the world are busy arguing over borderlines.

"I think it's time for all of us to grow up and recognize that whether we have a Jewish state is not going to depend on whether we keep this hill or that hill," he said. "It's going to depend on these issues."

These issues, he said, are being influenced by some of the most powerful factions of Israeli society.

Hazony used the Israeli Supreme Court as one such example. The Court is "one of the leading purveyors of the idea that there may be a problem with the idea of Israel as a Jewish State," he said.

At issue for the Israeli Supreme Court was "whether it's legally permissible for the Israeli government to in any way assist in the creation of a Jewish settlement, and last year the Supreme Court ruled this to be an illegal policy."

The Israeli Defence Forces also illustrates the post-Zionist intellectual influence, Hazony said.

For the past few years, he explained, the army has followed a code of ethics, developed by a professor instead of a chief of staff, that permits soldiers to refuse to partake in a mission.

"In all of the 11 basic values and 33 principles, there's not one reference to the Jewish people, to the Jewish State, to anything that you could imagine that could be a representation of something particularistic about Israel as a Jewish State," which, if present, could help to remind the soldiers of what they are truly fighting for, he said.

Subsequently, an idea was proposed to allow the soldiers to fight for "a Jewish purpose" in addition to the other things listed in the code of ethics for which they are permitted to fight, Hazony said. However, the results of this proposal are yet unknown.

Hazony praised the work that Toronto Jews have done to help the Jewish State and urged the audience to be more involved to protect Israel from post-Zionist influences.

"I wish the Jewish community in the State of Israel could learn from Toronto," he said. "God bless you, you're doing something amazing here."

"And there are many ways to achieve that. You could do it within one school and teach tolerance and democratic values within a larger body. That's one way of dealing with this issue.

"However, a pluralistic society also allows for the other option [funding for faith-based schools], which bespeaks the diversity of its population.

"I don't think of this as a public versus private school issue. This is simply an extension of the notion that public school education should allow for a milieu that is identifiable religiously, linguistically and culturally."

Furthermore, Epstein said, education should be able to exist within a system that is supportive of specific cultures or ethnic groupings because it is more effective to teach children when educators can understand and address individual backgrounds.

From a pedagogical point of view, it is always important to address individual needs, said Elsa Chandler, former trustee and chair of the North York Board of Education. She has been involved in education for more than 25 years.

"The government did the right thing," Chandler said, "and clearly it was long overdue.

"However, I also believe that no money should be taken out of the public school system to fund independent schools.

"In Ontario today, public schools need additional funding," Chandler said, "so that all the needs of our society can be met.

"I have lived under different regimes," noted Chandler who is a Holocaust survivor. "Unfortunately, we know what can happen when the main populace isn't educated properly."

With regard to the argument that the tax break is going to favour the rich, Epstein said our Jewish day schools are filled with students from lower and lower-middle income homes who are having trouble getting by without UJA FEDERATION assistance.

"Until now, they haven't benefited from the taxes they've been paying."

In fact, Epstein said, the current tax break may bring more lower income families into the Jewish day school system.

"And the schools are absolutely ready and up to the challenge," he said.

Outside of the United States, Jewish-based education is supported all over the world, Epstein said. However, the Ontario government has chosen to do it differently than other jurisdictions have.

While this recent proposal is being implemented through tax breaks and the revenue portion of the budget, other places in the world have chosen to provide funding through the expense side.

"In France for example," Epstein said, "teachers for the general education side of the curriculum [in Jewish schools] are supplied and paid directly by the ministry of education."

In these types of situations, the curriculum has to comply with ministry guidelines.

Here, it is still unclear whether the Ontario minister of education will want to intervene on issues of curriculum, Epstein said.

At this point, there does not seem to be any indication that the ministry will intervene.

However, this is only an issue for those schools that may be falling below provincial standards, he noted.

"At a high school level this should not be a concern at all because students have to meet basic ministry guidelines to get high school diplomas."

In addition, Epstein said, "it is astounding how much more we add to a student's curriculum in the Jewish day schools.

"We teach a third language [Hebrew], Jewish history, Bible, commentaries, rabbinics, customs, traditions, ethics.

"In our case, we're instructing our children on moral behaviour, good decision-making and tolerance."

Rachael Turkienicz, a professor at the centre for Jewish studies at York University, said that rabbinic literature emphasizes issues of tolerance.

For example, it is taught that all social structures available in the Jewish community must also exist in the non-Jewish sector. In fact, if the non-Jewish community has not provided for essential social services, then it is incumbent on our community to help provide them, Turkienicz said.

"In our schools," Epstein said, "we're teaching our students to be good citizens."

Kwinter favours credit, Caplan calls it 'voucher'

Caplan added that the tax credit will "undermine" the public school system, and lead to "a segregated society. Surely to God there must be a way to accommodate diversity in the public system."

Also last week, CJC held meetings with officials of the finance ministry to wade through the mechanics of the initiative. Not yet clear is how the credit will interact with existing charitable deductions, and how it will affect parents who do not pay full fees.

Under the plan, parents will be eligible for a tax credit of up to $700 per child, or 10 percent of the first $7,000 of tuition fees, beginning next year. To be phased in over five years, the credit will increase 20 percent per year, and eventually will be worth up to $3,500 per child annually, or half of a maximum tuition of $7,000.

Monte Kwinter

Kwinter, a longtime supporter of public funding for Jewish day schools, told The CJN that while he has some reservations, he is "certainly, totally delighted" with the measure.

"The problem is that it's clouded by including non-faith schools," Kwinter said. "Its real purpose has been diluted. I would have been a lot happier if it had been restricted [to religious schools only]."

He said he has "a real problem" with threats to repeal the measure, but downplayed the view that his stance places him at odds with McGuinty.

"I've always been offside on this issue. When the time comes, I'll vote my conscience."

As well, at a press conference last week at Queen's Park where representatives of Jewish, Muslim and Christian schools came together in support of funding for independent schools, things turned tense when reporters demanded to know whether private schools that receive public funds should be open to public scrutiny, what would happen if they taught intolerance, and whether this credit was enough.

Panelists, including CJC's Morgan, said the secular portion of curricula has always conformed to government guidelines, and that schools which teach intolerance would be subject to established human rights codes, as they are now.

They said religious groups simply seek parity with Catholics.

And they stressed the uniqueness of a religious education, the content of which should be left up to religious communities to decide.

David Caplan

"The government of Ontario is not qualified to teach Judaic studies," Morgan said. "It would be foolish to think they can actually inspect and dictate the content of Judaic studies classes."

Orthodox Jews, he stated, face special problems in the public system. "One cannot be an Orthodox Jew in the public schools. You simply can't ask Orthodox Jewish families to educate their children in a way required by the religion, in the public schools."

And private schools contribute to Canada's multicultural fabric, Morgan went on: "Multiculturalism builds a tolerant society. We are not an assimilationist society. Canadian society can afford this... We cannot discriminate and then say it's too expensive to fix."

In his prepared remarks, Morgan said there is no evidence to support the claim that this plan would weaken or undermine the public system. And in provinces that provide public help for private schools, there has been no mass exodus from public to private schools, as some detractors have said.

Morgan's written remarks described as "offensive" McGuinty's earlier claim that private schools are elitist. However, Morgan skipped that when he read his statement.

He also said the "vast majority" of the 11,300 students enrolled in Jewish day schools come from middle and lower income families.

Morgan said Jewish schools would have "no problem" with mandatory, standardized testing.

Asked whether he would "instruct" members of the Jewish community to vote against the Liberals, Morgan said there's "no doubt" the community could become "galvanized" around their opposition to the measure.

Morgan later said it was telling that two strong supporters of the tax credit were absent at his meeting with McGuinity: Kwinter and Michael Bryant, the MPP for St. Paul's. Caplan, on the other hand, was in attendance.

Rivalry, animosity not helping: Rabbi Steinsaltz

If Jews in general, and observant Jews in particular, "would feel there's a light shining on them, you would have far less to fight about," the rabbi asserted.

Deflecting a question about universal lessons from his personal transformation – which he has described as "more than a surprise" to himself, in part because of his one-time lack of admiration for religious Jews – Rabbi Steinsaltz referred to his life as "very undramatic" and "rather boring."

"I didn't climb any tall mountains," he said. "I didn't kill any lions."

Yet as an educator who studied mathematics and chemistry at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, the rabbi is particularly qualified to speak on secular as well as religious educational issues.

Sometimes a secular education is wanted, and necessary, he said. "But for most Jews in this country and many others," Rabbi Steinsaltz continued, "the level of their Jewish and secular education is so unequal. Imagine that a person has two legs: one normal, and one dwarfed and shrunken. You can't walk properly like this… It's like a marriage between a duck and an elephant. I don't know if it can be done."

> 'We are in danger of losing our identity'

The number of uniting links within the Jewish community is diminishing, said the rabbi. "There was a time when people could share memories of their grandfathers. People were different, but they had similar grandfathers… [Now] we share a smaller number of common memories, and that makes it in some ways harder."

Clarifying the differences between assimilation and intermarriage, Rabbi Steinsaltz said that assimilation can happen with or without intermarriage.

Assimilated Jews are "basically out," he stated. "If you are out, intermarriage is a kind of solution."

Yet Jewish education, in and of itself, "cannot do that much," he said. He suggested that the "amount of desire" transmitted is far more important. "If people really want something – money or a girl – they not only work at it but have a good chance of getting it."

The rabbi is not a fan of "moderate" institutions. "I know that moderation is next to holiness in North America. I never understood why." He believes that young people who "want some kind of excitement… don't tend to follow moderation."

His own life's work has sparked not only excitement but reverence, evidenced by the hush that fell over the packed hall as he entered, when the mixed crowd of Orthodox and non-Orthodox people rose to their feet.

Speaking on Jewish Unity and the Jewish State for the Moshe J. & Louis Weisfeld Annual Memorial Lecture, Rabbi Steinsaltz likened Jewish unity to the weather – a subject everyone talks about but about which few people do anything.

"We are a fragmented people putting lots of energy into fighting each other [and] ignoring each other," he said.

Even in the Warsaw ghetto, Rabbi Steinsaltz pointed out, left- and right-wingers could not unite. "Just imagine, these people are going to die fighting a very cruel fight… and they disagree about one thing: what political and economic shape the Jewish state, that doesn't exist, will take in the future. It would be funny if it [weren't] so tragic."

Sometimes people must disagree, he allowed, making it clear that he is not against disagreement per se. "Uniformity in any species always brings a species to the brink of death," he said. "When you have diversity, you have a chance."

But diversity, combined with an inability to interact, is dangerous and shameful, he stated, moderating his criticism somewhat by praising the Toronto community as "exceptional," comparatively speaking.

At one point, he assured the Canadian audience that he is equally outspoken in Israel, where he was born in 1937.

Almost every Jewish community is "under a real threat," Rabbi Steinsaltz said. "They don't kill many Jews… even in Israel, but we are in danger of losing our identity."

Demographically, Jews have too many funerals and too few births, he said. In the former Soviet Union, where he was invited in 1995 to assume the position of Duchovny Ravin, Spiritual Leader of Russian Jewry, the ratio is 9 to 1. "We need 2.2 children per family in order to sustain the numbers."

Nowadays, Jews are being lost to Judaism in a way that's not obvious, the rabbi said. "In other times, when a person would leave the Jewish community, he would at least bang the door so we could count. When someone converted in the past, everybody knew about it. Now you just leave the room. Nobody notices, and you find out later that the fellow is absent."

He denounced the notion of patrilineal descent, whereby some members of the Reform movement in the United States began in the 1990s to recognize children of Jewish fathers and non-Jewish mothers as Jewish. If a similar situation arose in another domain – the business world, for example – it could lead to arrest for falsifying documents, he said.

From a demographic point of view alone, the practice skews the number of Jews counted as part of the community, he noted.

"We are facing a common danger. Because of that, the first thing to do, if we are all in some way drowning, at least we should hold hands and try to help each other in order to fight against that… Our splintering rivalry and… animosity is surely not helping."

The Ontario budget and Leviticus

BY CARLY STEINMAN
Special to The CJN

That's what I have to do now, I have to lock the freezer because my kids will go into it. It's hard to tell the kids that they can't eat. One time I didn't lock it and they went and grabbed wieners because they were hungry. The welfare cuts are really bad. – Magda, Thunder Bay (reported in Broken Promises: Welfare Reform in Ontario).

And when you reap the harvest of your land, you shall not fully reap the corner of your field, neither shall you gather the gleanings of your harvest: you shall leave them for the poor and for the stranger: I am the Lord your God. – Leviticus 19:9.

The provincial budget is a Jewish issue. I decided this as I sat in the Ontario legislature on May 9, listening to Finance Minister Jim Flaherty read our new budget. I thought about the Jewish tradition of tikkun olam, striving to repair our world. I thought about the commandment to pursue tzedekah – justice, and about Jewish participation in historic struggles against injustice and discrimination. I thought about the foresight of Leviticus 19, which challenges us to establish a caring and compassionate public system. I thought about Ontarians like Magda who have been suffering in a province that treats its poor as if they have done something terribly wrong.

As I rose to leave Queen's Park, I knew that the contents of this budget should be an outrage to our Jewish sensibilities. Would we accept a budget that boasts the same provincial government message delivered since 1995 – that those who can most afford to meet their own needs are our most valued citizens? This budget announces corporate tax cuts of $2.4 billion dollars, on top of last year's corporate tax cut of $3.95 billion. Surely this money is sorely needed to renew decaying public services! I offer two examples:

- Major Ontario cities are in an affordable housing crisis. The supply of rental housing is rapidly declining, and rents are soaring. Toronto's vacancy rate stands at an unhealthy 0.6 percent, and Ottawa's is even worse, at 0.2 percent! Astoundingly, the budget of the Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Housing is down by more than $600 million dollars this year.
- The figure 21.6 percent is a familiar and chilling one for social advocates and people on social assistance. Social assistance rates were slashed by this amount as soon as this Conservative government took power. People saw their monthly incomes drop precipitously overnight. The rates have been frozen since then, and this new budget offers no relief. Try and imagine for a moment how much money a single parent with a child living in Toronto needs per person per day, after rent and food are covered. What figure do you come up with?

A recent study by the Ontario Social Safety Network shows that the actual daily amount this parent has left over is 2.24$ per person, per day. With this, the parent must cover costs such as transportation, school supplies, clothing, user fees, telephone and much more.

Mr. Flaherty opened his budget presentation by proudly stating, "No other government has made such responsible choices." We should challenge Mr. Flaherty to reconsider the definition of the word "responsible." In a Jewish sense – in a moral sense – "responsible" means leaving the corners of our field for others, using our taxes to provide public services and meet socio-economic needs. It does not mean leaving needy individuals entirely responsible for themselves by denying them basic essentials and allowing our public institutions to crumble.

I hope readers feel as I do, that these budget decisions do not describe a vision for a hopeful and compassionate community. A far more responsible budget, called the "Ontario Alternative Budget," proposed by the Canadian Centre for Policy Alternatives, can be seen on the Web site www.policyalternatives.ca. It provides a detailed plan to put $10 billion towards the renewal of public services. I quote, "We propose new funding to put Ontario back into the affordable housing business and make a serious attempt to deal with the crisis of homelessness."

This 2001/2002 fiscal plan is an inherently Jewish issue. We should not feel comfortable with it. It is not responsible. It is not justice. It is not tikkun olam.

Jackson honoured by Jewish Campus Services

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Local Jewish students who are now freshmen will – "hopefully" – be able to enjoy a beautiful new facility in their final year of study, announced David Gotfrid at this year's annual awards night of Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (JCS).

Gotfrid, who is president of JCS, was referring to the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, a facility to be built at the northwest corner of Huron and Harbord streets as part of UJA FEDERATION's Jewish Toronto Tomorrow initiative. The new centre will replace the current rented premises for the Jewish Students' Union at the University of Toronto.

JCS projections indicate the new centre will be up and running in 2003, said Gotfrid, speaking at Beth Tzedec Congregation. "Our goal is to have a shovel in the ground by next spring."

He also alluded to recent discussions between U of T and restaurant owner Ho Chow, whose leased premises have to be vacated for JCS to proceed with its plans. Gotfrid commended the university on its professional handling of the situation, which has been resolved.

At York University, discussions have been initiated regarding what can be done "to improve the space" for Jewish students there as well, Gotfrid indicated.

He also discussed participation of Canadian students in Birthright Israel this year, noting that over 1,000 students from across Toronto participated in the program. About half of them left on short notice after 500 spots opened up because of the number of Americans who had dropped out three weeks before departure.

JCS staff "had no problem filling those spots. That's something the Canadian community should be proud of... Our students wanted to go there to show their support to Israel in a state of crisis."

Zac Kaye, executive director of JCS, stressed the inclusive and pluralistic nature of the campus community he's been largely responsible for building over the past six years, noting the "breadth and depth of the multiplicity of [JCS] events."

Susan Jackson, UJA FEDERATION's director of community planning, continuity, culture and overseas affairs, said she wanted to say thank you to the students instead of the other way around. Jackson was the evening's featured speaker and winner of JCS' Founding Friend of the Campus Award.

As Birthright's scholar-in-residence this February, Jackson said she "saw folks who had no interest in going [to Israel] but it was free, so what the heck? By the end I saw committed Jewish students, committed to the community and to learning more.

"I can be comfortable that the Jewish future here is secure," she said.

Like Kaye, Jackson emphasized the pluralism of the Jewish campus community.

"Hillel isn't any longer that nerdy place to go," she said. "It's a warm place, a happening place, and a place where we get together and have all kinds of discussions, but what we all have to remember is that we're not always at the same place at the same time. We all see the world differently, and that's part of the beauty of who we are and what we do."

Student campus awards went to:

- Brian Wolk, from the Jewish Students' Association at Ryerson Polytechnic University;
- David Collin, Ja'el Gratto and Naomi Peleg; from the Jewish Students' Federation at York University; and
- Yael Ben-Dat & Keren Held, Judith Peranson, Devora Holder & Jenny Herbert, from the Jewish Students' Union at the University of Toronto.

Citywide awards were also given:

- Keren Fyman, the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto Action Committee for Jewish Continuity Award for Enhancing Jewish Identity and Continuity;
- Michelle Astrug and Marc Levy, the Jacobovici Family Award for Arts and Culture;
- Aaron Kasman, The Canadian Jewish News Award for Communication;
- Ron Somogyi, the Gropper Family Award for Outstanding Leadership;
- Jacob Moshinsky, The Paisley Manor Insurance Brokers Inc. Award for Special Involvement in Jewish Campus Life;
- Adina Libin, the Gottesman Family Award for Strengthening Koach, the Conservative Movement;
- The York JSF executive, the Nechama and Ya'akov Kaner Award for Creative Programming for the Jewish Link, a one-day event that brought community organizations to the campus;
- Barbara Zeller, the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto Award for Chesed and Social Justice; and
- Aron Papernick, the Jewish Campus Services Award for Ongoing Commitment to Jewish Student Life.

Honourable mentions went to Fauna Mandel for Continuous Dedication to GAP Programming and Jason Weshler for Outstanding Commitment to Jewish Campus Life.

Jewish journalists discuss craft at Afterword meet

By LARA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Students recently enjoyed a smorgasbord of opinions from local media personalities and journalists at the third annual Afterword Media Conference, held at the Toronto Zionist Centre (organized by Canada's national Jewish student newspaper, Afterword). Discussion topics ranged from reporting on the Middle East to Jewish stereotypes in popular culture.

National Post columnist Rebecca Eckler recounted her experience as a young journalist. Speakers such as Liza Cooperman, planning editor for the National Post, offered practical advice for finding jobs. Seminars on perfecting writing skills helped students learn the tricks of the "j" trade.

> 'Mainstream culture doesn't like religion'

Jonathan Kay, editorials editor for the National Post, started off the conference with an astute and scathing analysis of media reporting on Israel. Kay argued a "double standard" is applied toward Israel in the Western media: "You can't tell the truth about Israel without being labeled anti-Arab… Anti-Semitic and anti-Israeli statements are very common in the Arab press, we just don't hear that much about it."

Contextualizing his statements with various facts and figures, Kay explained, "The combined Arab population in the Middle East outnumbers the Jewish population by about 50 to one, and yet there are two or three times more stories in newspapers and other media outlets about that small group of Jews… The result of this is that Western media treatment is skewed."

Research psychiatrist and columnist for the National Post Dr. Norman Doidge analyzed what he termed as "Jewish paralysis," the lack of Jewish activism in North America, specifically with regard to the current situation in the Middle East.

From a psychoanalytical perspective, Doidge explained how "denial" and "repression" are among "powerful psychological forces… operating" on the Jewish community. As a result, Doidge claimed, "The community is very lackadaisical about these things."

Doidge questioned, for example, why there have been so few boycotts of newspapers such as the Toronto Star. "It's shameless that most Jews still get the [newspaper]."

Suanne Kelman, professor of journalism at Ryerson University, discussed Jewish stereotypes in the media when she spoke on a panel with Evan Solomon, host of CBC Newsworld's Hot Type, co-founder and executive editor of Shift Magazine and author of Crossing the Distance (McClelland and Stewart, 1999).

Jews are "over-represented in the media…, not just in news, but [also] in entertainment," Kelman said. Additionally, she noted, gender plays a significant role in the characterization of Jews.

"Jewish women on TV do tend to be the Jewish princess joke."

Hollywood and the Holocaust have dramatically changed the portrayal of Jewish characters, who were historically most-often depicted as "villainous conspirators," Kelman indicated.

"A tradition developed in our culture… of playing down Jewishness… Mainstream culture doesn't like religion."

Using the television sitcom Seinfeld as an example, Kelman illustrated the ambiguity of the Jewish identity of various personalities on television, saying that although Seinfeld is brimming with Jewish euphemisms, Judaism is rarely discussed.

"Why on earth does the character who seems most Jewish, George Costanza, have an Italian name? All this obviously is because… the Hollywood… discomfort with Jewishness lingers."

Solomon urged the community to be conscious of our own stereotyping as a result of the entertainment industry.

"The Jewish understanding of the Holocaust has been reduced to the Hollywood stereotype of victims of everyone… What is important is that Jews begin to come to a more nuanced understanding of the Holocaust."

Moving beyond stereotypes in Middle East discourse is also crucial, Solomon argued.

"We ought to be vigilant that we use the proper terms," he said. "For example, 'Arabs and Jews.' It's actually more complicated than that. There's Israeli Arabs, and there's Arabs, and there's… Palestinians, and there's Jordanians. It's not a big mass. And there's all sorts of kinds of Jews there as well. We buy into these stereotypes, we flatten it, and we're forced to take sides we're uncomfortable with, and that is not Jewish. Judaism is about complexity. Think about Abraham and…Nineveh…. here's a guy saying to God, after an edict, 'Wait a second, how about a little dialogue?' And God says, 'I'm fine with that.'

"Don't you think it behooves us to have the courage to be critical of our own people in the media?"

Judging by such thought-provoking comments from professionals in the field, Jewish students are being given the opportunity to prepare to be critical journalists themselves.

Dedication and Cantorial Concert

SUNDAY, JUNE 3

8:00 pm, Inn On The Park

It has been more than 70 years since the Conservative movement last produced a Torah commentary for synagogue use. What is commonly called the Hertz Chumash was introduced in 1929.

After years of preparation, the Rabbinical Assembly and the United Synagogue for Conservative Judaism are unveiling the Eitz Chayim Chumash – produced by some of the finest conservative movement scholars – at a dedication ceremony, taking place June 3rd, the first day of the annual Rabbinical Assembly Conference.

"While we recognize that the Hertz Chumash is a classic, there have been major strides in the Biblical scholarship and commentary in the last 70 years," says Rabbi David L. Lieber, the senior editor of the new commentary.

The dedication precedes a cantorial concert featuring chazanim from five Toronto synagogues. Cantors Eli Kirshblum, Adath Israel; Marshall Loomer, Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am; Eric Moses, Beth Sholom; Ephraim Sapir, Beth Tikvah; and Aaron BenSoussan, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda will entertain the assembly members and the public during the second half of the evening.

"For many years," says Lieber, "leaders of the Conservative movement spoke of the desirability of issuing a new commentary that would reflect the latest scholarship, the ideology of the Conservative movement, and the contemporary sensibilities of our community." ■

Three Distinguished Canadians

MONDAY, JUNE 4

8:00 pm, Beth Tzedec Synagogue

Montreal MP and human rights activist Irwin Cotler will be the keynote speaker on Monday, June 4th following an awards presentation to three distinguished Canadians: Justice Abraham Lieff, Judy Feld Carr and Manny Batsha.

Professor Irwin Cotler

Professor Cotler, a former president of Canadian Jewish Congress and the Member of Parliament for Mount Royal, will be speaking on "Human Rights and Jewish Interests."

The evening's first honouree, Justice Abraham H. Lieff, was founder and past president of Congregation Agudath Israel, Ottawa's first Conservative synagogue, and was a pioneer in family law.

Justice Abraham H. Lieff

Justice Lieff began his career when matrimonial trials were bitter and expensive. Over time he was responsible for establishing pre-trial conferences as well as other ways to minimize the conflict and cost of divorce . In 1963 he was the first Jew appointed to the Supreme Court of Ontario.

Judy Feld Carr

Judy Feld Carr has been working for Jewish causes for over 35 years.

However, she is especially well known for her passionate commitment to the Jews of Syria - both the majority who have started new lives in Israel, and those who still remain.

Montrealer Manny Batshaw recently completed 60 years of Jewish communal service as a social worker and community organizer. Extremely sensitive to the suffering of individuals, and in particular, those who claim to have been treated unjustly, Batshaw has long provided his support to many whom he felt were being harassed by the establishment.

Rabbi Vernon Kurtz, president of the RA, says, "We are proud to honour three distinguished Canadian Jews who have contributed greatly to Canada and the worldwide Jewish community. In honouring them the Rabbinical Assembly recognizes the significant contribution of Canadian Jews to their country and to the Jewish people." ■

Rabbis Gather from Across the Glob

From June 3-7 rabbis from four continents will gather in Toronto for the annual Rabbinical Assembly (RA), sponsored in part by UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto. The RA is being co-chaired by Montreal's Rabbi Lionel Moses while Toronto's Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec Congregation is the Chair.

Organizers expect 500 delegates to participate in the event, which includes lectures throughout the GTA and the dedication of the first Chumash for synagogue use since 1929.

"The Rabbinical Assembly convention will bring to Toronto some of the excitement and energy of the Conservative movement. We will present to the community some of the finest contemporary Jewish

Torah in Toronto

TUESDAY, JUNE 5
7:30 pm, Various Locations

Tuesday night's Torah in Toronto gives an exciting, interactive dimension to the RA, allowing people to study with five of the teachers responsible for the composition of the new Eitz Chayim Chumash.

Rabbi David Golinkin

Rabbi David Golinkin of the Schechter Institute of Jewish Studies in Israel will be at Beth Tikvah Congregation where he will speak on "A Believing Jew and Biblical Criticism." Is the Bible true? Did the Exodus really occur? Did Moses write down the Torah?

At the Bloor Jewish Community Centre, Professor Baruch Levine of New York University discusses "Religion as Experience: The Meaning of Ritual." Here we learn that ritual is a code of conduct which reveals an entire value system.

Professor Baruch Levine

At Adath Israel Congregation, University of California Professor, Rabbi Jacob Milgrom explains the reason why Jews wear prayer garments with tassels while answering the question of "what prayer apparel tells us about our self-conception as Jews." The audience will also hear about the reason for the mysterious blue thread.

Rabbi Jules Harlow, the Literary Editor of the new Eitz Chayim Chumash will be at Kolel: The Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning discussing "How the Siddur Quotes and Misquotes the Bible." What were the rabbis trying to achieve by altering quotes from Bible text?

Rabbi Harold Kushner

At the Associated Hebrew School, Thornhill campus, Rabbi Harold Kushner, author of "When Bad Things Happen to Good People" and the co-editor of the Chumash will focus on the topic, "Learning to See an Invisible God." ■

Torah, Technology & Theology

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 6
8:00 pm, Inn On The Park

Science and theology may seem like strange bedfellows, but two prominent lecturers -one a rabbi, the other a scientist - plan to bring the two together at this year's assembly.

Dr. Martin Moskovits, Dean of Sciences, University of California, Santa Barbara and Rabbi Byron Sherwin, Professor of Jewish Ethics & Mysticism, Spertus College of Judaica, will be lecturing on "Torah, Technology and Theology."

Dr. Moskovits will examine whether or not modern science and technology is compatible with traditional Jewish thought.

Moskovits also plans to address artificial intelligence (AI), the question of whether computers can be programmed to learn the characteristics we attribute to humans.

Rabbi Byron Sherwin

He will also speak on how Jewish theology, ethics and law can address and confront the "new" science and technology.

Both Moskovits and Sherwin have spent years studying and writing about these topics. Rabbi Sherwin has authored 23 books and over 150 articles. His writings have been translated into Polish, Chinese, Spanish and Italian. ■

Convention a Homecoming for RA president

Rabbi Vernon Kurtz, president of the Rabbinical Assembly, is proof personified that you truly can "go home again!" When the Rabbinical Assembly arrives in Toronto on June 3rd it will be a homecoming for this Toronto native.

Rabbi Vernon Kurtz

Rabbi Kurtz, 50, spent his first 20 years in Toronto, graduating from both Associated Hebrew School and CHAT (Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto). In 1971, bearing a degree from York University, he went to Israel for a year to study. His next four years were spent in New York City at the Jewish Theological Seminary where he earned his MA and Rabbinic Ordination. From NYC, the new rabbi traveled west to Chicago, first to Congregation Rodfei Zedek from 1976 to 1987 and, in 1998, he moved to Highland Park. ■ thinking about Bible and future directions for synagogue life. We will explore the current state and future of Israel. This also is an opportunity to showcase the depth of our community to a community of rabbis," says Rabbi Frydman-Kohl.

This assembly has been underwritten by the Beverly and Morris Baker Foundation, Benjamin Park Memorial Chapel, Joey & Toby Tanenbaum, State of Israel Bonds, the Israel Government Tourist Office, Steeles Memorial Chapel, Beth Tzedec Congregation, Adath Israel Congregation, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Congregation and Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation. ■

Community volunteers to be honoured

By JULIA KOLLEK
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — Hamilton's 51st Negev Dinner on June 6th will honour Elaine and Cuppy Katz, a couple with a strong commitment to their community and to Israel.

Funds raised from the dinner will go towards building the Ne'ot Temarim Reservoir in the Negev desert. The goal is to bring water to the area for agriculture, while at the same time freeing the current supply for domestic use.

Elaine and Cuppy are lifelong volunteers who have dedicated their time and energy to their synagogue, as well as to the United Jewish Appeal, Shalom Village (the local senior's residence), B'nai Brith, the Jewish National Fund, Israel Bonds, Hadassah, the Canadian Cancer Society, Mount Sinai Hospital, Hamilton's Royal Botanical Gardens, the Rotary Club and the Masons.

In addition to all the community work they do together, Cuppy has taught judo and swimming to youngsters, and visits an inner city elementary school to read to a class.

"I get a lot of pleasure out of doing this," he says. "It's a lot of fun."

"We do what we can to help," Elaine says. "Every day we say how lucky we are and we don't take it for granted. We want to give something back to our community."

Members on each side of Elaine and Cuppy's families are also noted for their achievements. Elaine's grandparents emigrated from Poland, and settled in Acton, Ont. At the time, there were few Jewish families in the town, and the family had to make extra efforts to maintain their Jewish way of life. Every Thursday, Elaine's mother, Ethel Rachlin, would take a wicker basket of live chickens on the train, hiding the lively package under her seat. On the way to school, she would take the chickens to the shochet's home to be butchered, and pick up the "finished product" at the end of the day. Other kosher food was brought in from Toronto, 45 miles away.

Elaine and Cuppy Katz

Before she married, Ethel was promoted to secretary-treasurer for the Hydro Commission at the town hall, an unusual opportunity for a woman – let alone a Jewish one – in 1921.

Elaine's father, Ben, and Ethel set up a clothing store in their town, which by the time Elaine and her brother Ted were born, had grown to a population of 3,000. The Rachlins were well-respected in the community, with Ben being elected mayor of Acton in 1952, becoming one of two Jewish mayors in Ontario at the time. Almost 20 years later, the couple were feted by the townspeople on their 40th wedding anniversary, for their 40 years of community service.

But a connection with Jewish community life was missing. There was only one other Jewish family in town, and to enable their son Ted to have Jewish friends, the couple sent him to live with relatives in Toronto when he was 13. Later, Elaine and her parents also moved to Toronto. Elaine went on to study at teachers' college, and took a post in a North York school.

Cuppy's family also emigrated from Poland. His father Nutte moved to Hamilton, and when he had saved up enough money, he brought over Gitel, his bride. She became renowned in Hamilton for her cooking, and was much sought after as a caterer for weddings and bar mitzvahs.

Nutte, meanwhile, built up a successful business in auto-wrecking ("the original recyclers," Cuppy says). He bought Dominion Auto, an auto-wrecking company, turning it from a three-person firm to one with more than 20 employees. He was highly respected for his unfailing honesty and his uncanny memory. Although he could neither read nor write, he was able to find garages, insurance companies and towing businesses even if he had only been driven there once.

Cuppy left school at 16 – earlier than he had planned – to join his father in the business, with his brother Bernie joining them shortly after. Following their father's death, the brothers continued to build up the firm. Influenced by what was happening in Europe and the States, they introduced inventory systems and a communication "hotline" that enabled scrap companies to network with each other and better locate parts for their customers. The yards became clean, organized and efficient.

Cuppy, a great believer in trade organizations, realized the importance of networking within the industry, and became a founding member of the Canadian Auto Recyclers, serving as secretary for 14 years. He was also the first non-American to be elected president of the Automotive Dismantlers and Recyclers of America.

Since Cuppy's retirement, he and Elaine enjoy spending more time with their children and grandchildren. Whenever they can, the couple pursues a shared love of travel that has taken them all over the world. They make a point of finding Jewish communities; by meeting people, going to synagogues and visiting museums, they feel connected with Jewish life wherever they go.

Lag B'Omer celebrated in Hamilton

By JULIA KOLLEK
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON – Lag B'Omer celebrations lit up the night sky at Hamilton's first community-wide bonfire, barbecue and fireworks event, held in a small field behind the JCC.

The idea was suggested to Frank Samuels, vice-principal of administration at the Hamilton Hebrew Academy, who emigrated here with his family just eight months ago. Samuels assembled a team of helpers from different groups in the city. Through their efforts, the cost of the evening was covered by each of Hamilton's three synagogues, and this enabled admission to be free (only hot dogs, hamburgers and pop were on sale).

"The main outlay was on the fireworks, as we hired professionals – together with the cost of a permit and a high insurance premium," Samuels said.

"No one synagogue alone could have afforded to host this event, and I could not have done this on my own either. It was a fantastic effort – people helped shop, schlepped out tables and helped barbecue."

The event attracted almost 200 people, many of whom risked sleeping in for school the next day by staying up beyond dusk to watch the spectacular fireworks show.

"I think the evening gave Lag B'Omer a new meaning that the whole community can get together and celebrate," Samuels said. "If people enjoyed it and went home saying they would like to come back next year, then it was a success.

"I hope it becomes an annual event," he added.

A choice statement or discretion

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

One of the qualities that distinguishes really great politicians from the pack centres on the ability to judge when to talk and when to adopt a more discreet approach to a problem. In the right circumstances, a choice statement can galvanize support for an idea or catapult an issue onto the public agenda. At other times, it is the quality of circumspection that achieves a much sought after goal.

Too often, under the pressure of a perceived need to be heard, politicians ignore the wisdom of discretion in favour of the splashier approach. A couple of recent developments make the point better than any lecture.

It was only a couple of weeks ago that a beleaguered Stockwell Day addressed the Canadian Jewish Congress and rocked the house with an unequivocal statement of support for the equally beleaguered Jewish state. It carried the crowd – and the headlines in newscasts across the country for almost a whole week.

It may have made the audience feel very good, but the ensuing controversy dashed any short-lived euphoria. His speech prompted political opponents to chastise him for a lack of balance and judgment.

Canadian Arabs were quick to cry foul and threaten legal action. Ultimately, Day himself backtracked and sought to make amends to the affronted National Council on Canadian-Arab Relations. Who won?

At pretty much the same time, the public learned that the government was finally moving forward on a difficult case involving a suspected Nazi war criminal. The two issues – Canadian Middle East policy and the prosecution of Nazi war criminals residing in Canada – press some of the same buttons. Both have the potential of pitting the Canadian Jewish community against other ethnic groups that have also grown and flourished in this country. Both issues are inherently volatile and emotionally-charged lightning rods. And both have the capacity to embroil a well-meaning politician in a veritable quagmire from which there is no easy escape.

Yet unlike Stockwell Day, Minister of Citizenship and Immigration Elinor Caplan successfully negotiated her way over every hurdle – including some within her own caucus, let alone the behemoth of government officialdom – with neither fanfare nor display. She got the job done, and done well, primarily because she remained focused on the objective and would not succumb to the temptation of ephemeral praise that could potentially jeopardize that objective. No comebacks, no apologies, no dilution of message. That's a distinguished and distinguishing piece of work – and worthy of real applause.

Israel throwing off the 'Superman/Krypton paradigm'

By ILAN RUBIN
Special to The CJN

Comment

Avigdor Lieberman, chair of the right-leaning FSU (former Soviet Union) immigrants' party Israel Is Our Home (Yisrael Beiteinu) and a minister in the Israeli cabinet, met recently, at his request, with a forum of ambassadors of the former Soviet Union, including Russia, Belarus, Ukraine and the Southern Asian Republics.

At the meeting, according to Ha'aretz, Lieberman complained about having been criticized by Israel Supreme Court Justice Aharon Barak, regarding some constitutional issue. Three months ago, Lieberman met with the same forum, and shared with them his views on the Middle East, from Aswan to Teheran.

A few months ago, Roman Bronfman, chair of the left-leaning FSU immigrants' party The Democratic Choice, met, also at his request, with this same forum of FSU ambassadors, to complain about Haredi positions on army induction, and civil marriages.

Over a year ago, Natan Sharansky, then minister of industry, made a well-publicized visit to Russia, where he met with Russian ministers, and even shared reminiscences with his former jailers in Lefortovo prison.

Certainly all the above encounters hold rich ironies, as well as reminders, once again, that enemies can and do become friends when it is expedient, and of the iron imperative of democratic, ethnic politics.

I would suggest, however, the fact that these encounters took place openly, without any public outcry, is surface evidence of a major techtonic shift in contemporary Israel. This shift merits deeper consideration.

When Zionist ideology at the turn of the century called upon the chalutzim to turn their backs on Eastern Europe and its unique form of Jewish life, it never imagined the Holocaust that was to engulf the Jewish communities there.

After the Shoah, the descent of the Iron Curtain over Eastern Europe made the whole eastern part of the continent virtually inaccessible to new olim of Eastern European origin.

A similar phenomenon of being cut off was experience by most olim from Arab lands. But in addition, they faced the implacable hostility of their countries of origin and the fact that every day, calls for Israel's annihilation were coming from across the porous borders in the Arabic language familiar to them. This made their psychological situation in their new homeland even more difficult.

The result was an Israel of uprooted orphans whose previous homes and families were gone, and whose very land and language, drenched in blood, was inaccessible to them. The very popular song Ein li eretz acheret (I have no other country) resonated especially poignantly for these citizens and their children.

An important part of the Israeli ethos regarding postwar olim, hidden just below the surface but actively promoted by the then-reigning ideologies and elites, hammered home by the mass media and widely supported by the general population (including many postwar olim themselves) was what I would call the Superman/Krypton paradigm:

Catapulted out of a world that was cataclysmically self-destructing, the infant/orphan is literally born again in the new Promised Land. Here the fatal flaw that doomed his prior world – lack of sovereignty and Jewish self-defence – will be fundamentally corrected. He is to embrace his new Israeli identity, totally wrapping himself in the colours of his new homeland. Only one thing can threaten him, weaken him and even kill him – anything from his former world.

Thus did the new Israeli nation grow up in its most formative years, a nation of immigrants from "virtual" countries of emigration. Moreover, the pain of the past and the cutting-off of the present made visits to their place of origin impossible, positive memories and reminiscences unwelcome, mother-tongues next to useless and a source of shame.

The olim from the FSU in the '70s, while of course fundamentally different from the Holocaust survivors and the olim from Arab lands, followed the same pattern in leaving behind their countries of origin. Those who left were happy to give up their Soviet passports and their Soviet way of life, and knew that they would never be able to go back again. Once in Israel, it was made clear to them that anything good that they had to say about their former lives was best kept to themselves.

Then, suddenly, the Iron Curtain collapsed in 1990, and Eastern Europe (and the FSU) were suddenly open to visits and reconnection. Over the past decade, hundreds of thousands of postwar Israelis have gone back to visit Eastern Europe and have brought their children and their children's children. (Interestingly, a similar phenomenon has happened with Israelis of Moroccan origin, whose tangible and totemic links to Morocco have also soared.)

Moreover, a million olim from the FSU during this past decade have come to Israel the way that Western olim, like myself, have always done: with a sense of self-identity and self-confidence that includes the lifetimes we had led in our countries of origin, pride in our languages and cultures of origin, and with the full understanding that we can visit "the old country" whenever we like and even send our children back for a summerwith their grandparents at the dacha – I mean the summer cottage!

Reconnection with roots is a sign of maturity. The ability to come to terms with one's past is a sine qua non for future growth – both personal and national.

Today's Israel is well on the way to freeing itself from the shackles of the Superman/Krypton paradigm, to opening itself to cultural ethnic pluralism. This major development has brought to the surface much long-repressed pain, and pent-up frustrations and angers. But it has also brought new energies.

To be an Israeli means, more than ever before, to bring to the national table the strengths, "specialnesses" and comfort levels with where one was born, and to join with other Israelis who came themselves, or are children of those who came, from over a hundred countries, to create this global Jewish village, this new Israel.

Recently I saw an advertisement in Yediot Acharonot encouraging attendance at the International Book Fair held biannually in Jerusalem. There for the first time that I can recall in 31 years, was a clear message indicating the drama of this new reality: "You are invited to buy books from beit eema" (literally: from your mother's home).

From Krypton to beit eema – a fundamental paradigm shift indeed! True, this new paradigm of cultural mosaic is shaky. True, it still needs to explore the necessary limits and parameters of ethnic (and religious!) pluralism within the larger common imperative of a Jewish state. But it is a path and a direction which holds great possibilities in helping to actualize the opportunities and challenges of our Zionist adventure.

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — Jews in Yugoslavia are praising the policy of President Vojislav Kostunica, but are concerned by an upsurge of anti-Semitic incidents in the seven months since Kostunica took office.

"It's a paradox, we can't explain it," said Aca Singer, president of the Federations of Jewish Communities in Yugoslavia. "Anti-Semitism does not run deep among Serbs, but still we are concerned at the trend and are watching the situation."

Kostunica assumed the presidency in October after strongman Slobodan Milosevic was ousted.

Kostunica delighted the Jewish community last month by taking part at ceremonies in Belgrade's synagogue marking Yom Hashoah. Other leading government figures also participated, along with the Israeli ambassador and representatives of Jewish communities.

"It was a very, very important gesture," said Singer, who spoke to JTA while in Washington for the annual meeting of the American Jewish Committee. "It was the first time that the president took part."

Nonetheless, he said, recent episodes of anti-Semitism in Belgrade and elsewhere have caused alarm.

These included several instances of anti-Semitic slogans and swastikas scrawled on city walls and the vandalization of Jewish memorial plaques in the towns of Kikinda and Zrenjanin.

Gravestones in the Jewish cemetery in Zrenjanin also were vandalized in February. In Kikinda, an elderly Holocaust survivor received a death threat in the mail and had swastikas scrawled on her door.

"There have been significantly more anti-Semitic attacks since the fall of Milosevic," said Lidija Petrovic, president of the Zrenjanin Jewish community. "We can't explain it."

Also alarming, Singer and Petrovic said, was an attempt by far-right nationalist leader Vojislav Seselj and his extremist Radical Party to compare their position to that of Jews during the Holocaust.

Singer said he protested a recent incident during which Seselj and other Radical Party members in the Serbian Parliament donned yellow armbands and claimed that they were "modern Jews'" threatened by the post-Milosevic government.

ISRAELIS PROTEST CNN NEWS COVERAGE: Israelis of all political and religious background demonstrated last week outside the offices of CNN in Jerusalem. They are angered at what they see as anti-Israel, pro-Palestinian reporting of the current violence. CNN and the BBC are particular objects of their anger. There is scant coverage by these media outlets, the protesters maintained, of the constant incitement to hatred against Israel emanating from the Palestinian Authority. [Isranet photo]

Bomb in Netanya kills four, wounds 80

As The CJN was going to early press deadline on May 18, news broke of a suicide bombing in Netanya.

NETANYA — At 11:30 a.m. Friday morning, a terrorist bomber blew himself up at the entrance of Netanya's busiest shopping mall, killing four others, and injuring over 80. The wounded were taken to nearby Laniado Hospital for treatment.

Raanan Gissin, Foreign Press and Public Affairs advisor to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said the following after the incident:

"Today's heinous bombing in Netanya, resulting in the death of innocent Israeli civilians, is just the latest result of a venomous campaign of incitement waged by the Palestinian Authority against Israel.

"This campaign of incitement – which is spewed 24 hours a day by the PA-controlled media – legitimizes, encourages and serves as a springboard for terror against Israel. The latest glaring example is Arafat's incitement-filled speech on the day of the 'Nakbah,' and the call today by the official Palestinian paper El Hayat el Jedidya, on the front page, for the killing of Jews wherever they can be found as a means to hasten the coming of the day of redemption.

"Another ominous development is the reports of a new situation where foreign journalists who want to expose the vicious campaign of Palestinian incitement are intimidated and forewarned by the PA against doing so. Any attempt to expose this campaign is silenced by the PA's strong-arm tactics against these journalists, who are told, at best, that they may lose their sources, and at worst, are directly threatened.

"This long-term practice of intimidation by the PA has now been revealed by several reporters who dared 'break the rules' as dictated by the PA."

Animosity at Syria

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BEIRUT — Syria's continuing military presence in Lebanon is back on the Beirut government's agenda after Syrian Defence Minister Mustafa Tlass last week criticized Lebanese officials who called for Syria's withdrawal.

In an interview with the Lebanese daily Al Diyar, Tlass blasted the Maronite Christian Patriarch in Lebanon, Nasrallah Sfeir, who had asked Pope John Paul II to coax then-prime minister Menachem Begin into agreeing to defend the Christians in the event of a war.

Lebanese Defence Minister Khalil Hrawi reacted to the interview by saying Tlass's position does not reflect the official Syrian position, and his comments were "factually incorrect." Sfeir said Tlass's comments "are not worthy of a response."

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The top Red Cross official in Israel and the Palestinian areas said last week the existence of Jewish settlements in the West Bank and Gaza Strip is a war crime, remarks that ignited another round of tension with Israel.

Rene Kosirnik, who heads the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) delegation here, said the settlements constitute a violation of human rights law under the Geneva Convention, the treaty intended to protect civilians in areas of conflict.

"The installation of a population of the occupying power in occupied territory is considered an illegal move; it is a grave breach [of law]," Kosirnik said.

"In principle, it is a war crime."

Foreign Ministry spokeswoman Yaffa Ben-Ari said the government was dismayed by Kosirnik's comments.

"It is quite inappropriate for the ICRC to prejudice the outcome of such negotiations by offering such loaded statements," Ben-Ari said. "By taking a public position on these issues, the ICRC compromises its ability to effectively work with both sides to serve its humanitarian mission."

The Red Cross traditionally maintains a policy of neutrality and does not normally speak out on sensitive political issues. However, Kosirnik told a news conference that the organization's opposition was based on international law, not politics.

"The International Red Cross is not a prosecutor and not a judge, but we are certainly advocates in lobbying for respect of human standards and humanitarian law," he said.

Kosirnik's comments followed a strained meeting last month between Red Cross officials and Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer. Responding to charges that Israel was violating Palestinian human rights, Ben-Eliezer angrily produced a picture of an Israeli baby killed by a Palestinian gunman.

At the same meeting, Ben-Eliezer criticized the Red Cross for failing to establish contact with four Israelis, including three soldiers, held hostage in Lebanon.

Another sore spot has been Israel's exclusion from full membership of the Red Cross movement, partly because the Red Cross refuses to recognize the emblem of the Israeli emergency service, a red Star of David.

Peres: Israel is in battle for existence

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel is locked in a battle for its existence, says Foreign Minister Shimon Peres.

"The problems are existential, and in all my days I have never known their like," he said last week in an interview with Ha'aretz.

"There were similar situations in the past, but then everybody was mobilized... Today, too, everyone must mobilize. Then, it was to survive, and now it is to prevent the danger of war and attain peace."

Peres said he feels "a heavy responsibility" to prevent "a retreat into the past of isolation and violence." He said it's important to prevent a situation in which Western countries make excuses for Palestinian terrorism.

"They must not tell us, 'There is terror because of your settlements'... It is very important there should be no justification or excuses [for terrorism], and I am running from place to place like a madman in order to explain this point."

Peres noted that while the United States has taken a firm stand against terrorism, "in Europe it isn't easy. There, they accept the equation of settlements versus terror. We must not let this happen in America as well."

Based on his talks with Palestinian officials, Peres said he believes that despite the growing hatred, there remains a chance to gain control of the situation. What is needed, he said, is to build "verbal and political bridges." Because of the violence, "these bridges are more complicated and need more cement... This is what I am trying to do."

Israel last week submitted its official response to the Mitchell committee report, in which the government accepted most of the report's recommendations, but disagreed with its demand for a complete freeze on settlement construction, and its link between such a freeze and a ceasefire.

In the coming days, Peres will try to find some formula for the settlements that is acceptable to Israel and which could be included in the final version of the report.

Israel, he said, supports the basic approach laid down in the report: a ceasefire, confidence-building measures, and a cooling-off period leading to resumed negotiations.

"The main problem lies in the Palestinians' court – can they stop the terror? I don't want people to say we are responsible; that it's because of the settlements. Ending the terror is the basis for everything."

Four principles, he added, will govern Israel's behaviour regarding the settlements:

• No new settlements will be built.

• No land will be expropriated for settlements.

• The settlements will be discussed in diplomatic negotiations.

• Israel will not use the term "natural growth" in the settlements for other purposes.

Peres defended the Israel Defence Forces' incursions into Palestinian-controlled territory. "If they would take away the mortars, we wouldn't go in," he said. "We aren't initiating the disturbances."

Journalist showcases hatred, despite consequences

Most foreign correspondents who report from the West Bank and Gaza focus on the day-by-day cycle of violence, especially Israeli retaliation (almost always captured by TV crews) for Palestinian provocations (rarely depicted). Because of this, other stories, especially those which displease the Palestinian Authority, go largely unreported.

Bucking this trend, Martin Fletcher of NBC News earlier this month created a stir when he showed how the Palestinians are indoctrinating their children in a campaign of hatred towards Israel and encouraging them to participate in the violence. And, Fletcher claimed, "they are using a stunning tactic – commercials on Palestinian TV asking children to drop their toys, pick up rocks, and do battle with Israel."

Fletcher presented a school in Gaza where "there is a daily prayer and a call to arms: 'Are you afraid?' one boy shouts. 'No,' they answer. And then, "We ask Allah to destroy the Jews.'"

Reminding us that more than half the population of Gaza are children under the age of fifteen, Fletcher concluded: "Already, young boys are learning how to fight. Summer camp teaches them how to resist the Israelis, but now they are being taught not to fear death. The greatest glory, they are told, is to be a martyr." An angry PA branded Fletcher's report "irresponsible journalism, if not forgery and manipulation."

This indoctrination of children to hate Israel is not a new phenomenon occasioned by the last period of violence.

The irrefutable fact is that such indoctrination went on during the Oslo process, not only in the schools, but also in the Palestinian media. It has created an atmosphere in which the most gruesome sort of crime, such as the stoning deaths and mutilation of two Israeli boys from Tekoa last week, which went largely underreported, can somehow be made to seem acceptable, if not justifiable.

Contrast Ariel Sharon's repeated apology for the accidental death of a Palestinian baby hit by Israeli shrapnel with Yasser Arafat's refusal to condemn the intentional slaying of the Israeli boys. There is no moral equivalence between the two incidents, but there is a huge moral gulf which separates the responses.

When the Palestinian leadership incites hatred, refuses to recognize its neighbours as having any legitimacy and humanity, and fuels its followers with futile dreams of Israel's destruction or disappearance, its people are led down a terrible road to endless strife.

It is time that western journalists reporting from the territories looked at this indoctrination phenomenon, even if it means offending PA sensibilities.

Germany and Hezbollah said in new talks on Israeli captives

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BEIRUT — A Lebanese newspaper last week reported that German mediators have resumed talks with Hezbollah guerrillas and Israel about a prisoner swap, and that the Israeli soldiers are alive.

But the Daily Star quoted an official as saying mediation efforts to swap four Israeli captives for Lebanese and Arab prisoners in Israel had made no progress because of conditions imposed by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

The three IDF soldiers were kidnapped while patrolling the northern border in October, and an Israeli businessman was kidnapped in Europe later the same month.

"Information about Israeli prisoners is still shrouded in secrecy and all that was known was they are alive," the English-language daily quoted the official as saying. "Overcoming obstacles may take time in view of the difficult conditions laid down by Sharon, including dismantling Hezbollah's missile bases in the south. Another major obstacle relates to the number of detainees and prisoners Hezbollah wants freed," he continued.

Hezbollah said talks were held up because Israel refused to free Palestinian detainees, though it had agreed to hand over Lebanese and Arab prisoners, as well as maps of mine fields in south Lebanon.

Haider's successor plans visit to Israel

By YAIR ETTINGER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — More than a year after its inclusion in Austria's coalition government sparked a crisis in Israel-Austria relations, the far-right Freedom Party is trying to court support in Israel.

Austria's vice-chancellor, Suzanne Riess-Passer, who inherited the Freedom Party leadership from Joerg Haider, has announced she will make a private visit to Israel sometime in the next few months.

Riess-Passer's spokesperson told Ha'aretz that the date of her visit has not been set, but she has an open invitation sent by an Israeli university. The spokesperson declined to give details.

Israel's Foreign Ministry has no information regarding the vice-chancellor's visit, one of its senior officials said.

"As long as this is a private visit, the vice-chancellor can't be stopped from coming to Israel, but the Foreign Ministry has no connection with the matter," the official said.

Similarly, the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, which is establishing an Austrian Studies research institute, denies knowledge about Riess-Passer's visit, and says it has no intention of inviting her.

Last February, responding to the Freedom Party's inclusion in Austria's government, Israel recalled its ambassador from Vienna.

The United States and European Union imposed sanctions against Austria. These were lifted when Haider resigned as Freedom Party head, and also after an EU-sponsored report found Austria's coalition posed no threat to human rights.

Riess-Passer has signaled her desire to improve relations with Israel. Officials in her office recalled last week that after Ariel Sharon's election as prime minister, Riess-Passer sent a letter of congratulations, asking Sharon to reconsider the outgoing Ehud Barak government's policy of refusing to return Israel's ambassador to Vienna.

Riess-Passer's spokesperson said Sharon ignored the request. Israeli Foreign Ministry officials said last week that they know nothing about the vice-chancellor's letter to Sharon.

NEWS, NEWS NEWS! Did you know that you can restore natural youthful beauty to your skin with no down time?

Fotofacial Pulsed Light Treatments can make a huge difference to the appearance of your face, neck and chest. This technique involves pulses of visible light that can effectively improve facial redness and flushing, as well as visible signs of sun damage and aging. It was first developed by board-certified dermatologist, Dr. Patrick Bitter Jr., as a non-invasive method of beauty enhancement to rejuvenate and improve skin with no recovery time. These treatments are available in Toronto at SpaMedica, 66 Avenue Rd.

Glam, glam and more glam is the theme for makeup this summer. Attitude is what it is all about. Bright gorgeous colours for those glorious days, and icy cool shades to set the mood for lots of hot sexy nights.

Instead of sitting in the sun, get out your face bronzer and dust your whole face. Self-tanners have come a long way. No more orange, just a sun-kissed glow. Apply your sunscreen daily at least a half-hour before leaving home. The rays are everywhere and the damage gets worse every year. For a little darker complexion, use a lightly textured foundation that is a few shades darker than your natural skin, but watch out for demarcation lines.

CAROL'S TIPS

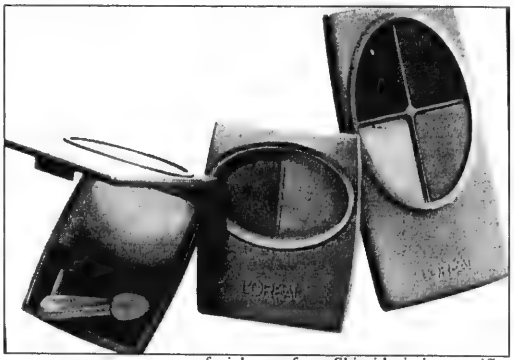
SKIN CARE: Biotherm offers a new feather-like daily fluid with an SPF of 25, and from their Biosensitive line, a soothing cream designed to give softness to your whole body. It penetrates the roughest patches yet leaves no oily film.

An intense calcium-rich body moisturizer comes to us from Christian Dior – its name – Hydra-Corps satin. It is ideally hydrating and leaves skin fresh and supple.

Chanel's new Masque Lift Express is a line-smoothing Mask that compliments their Precision skincare collection. This little wonder tones and firms with amazing results in a mere 10 minutes – a fabulous way to start the season.

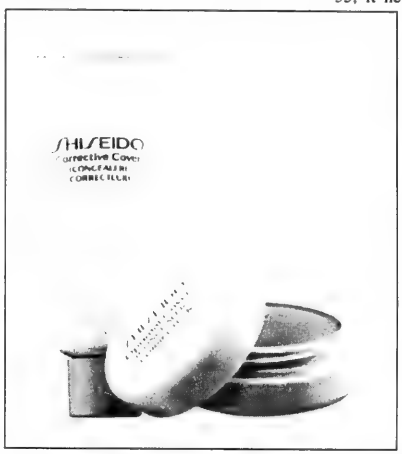
ROC introduces Retinol Body Contouring, a state of the art complex of active ingredients that act effectively against cellulite symptoms. The results promise to revitalize skin and visibly diminish fatty deposits.

Light and airy describe Elizabeth Arden's Green Tea (powerful anti-oxidant) body foam. It gently exfoliates and revitalizes to reveal an all-over glow. This would be great to use before applying self-tanners.



A transparent bubble of hydrating facial soap from Shiseido is just terrific. It cleanses away all makeup and leaves your skin as soft as silk.

A real gem from Shiseido's sun care line is a translucent Sun Block stick SPF 35, it helps target vulnerable areas like your nose, and it is water-resistant and sandproof.



FOUNDATION: Say good-by to shine with Liquid Powder by Quo. This two-in-one liquid foundation and powder provides excellent coverage with a velvety finish.

Lauder's Bikini Brights offers Bronze Goddess Soft Matte Bronzer that will enhance your skin tone with a sunny hue.

Elizabeth Arden creates a fabulous lotion this season and a powder compact called Let There Be Light. Both contain micro-light particles that brighten skin immediately and can be worn with or without liquid foundation.

Lise Watier created Base Miracle, a silicone-based semi-translucent gel that instantly transforms into a silky matte finish that keeps foundation fresh all day.

For the most gorgeous, even tan in just two or three hours, smooth on Shiseido's new moisturizing gel self-tanner. It is perfect for the face and body, dries in seconds, and leaves skin soft, supple and glowing. Top up your tan and protect your face with Shiseido's Sun block Compact with SPF 32. It is powder based, water-resistant and PABA-free.

CHEEKS: Lancaster has created the perfect summer shade for cheeks – Light Enhancing powder blush, a matte apricot that will give your face a special summer radiance.

Lauder's Day Glow Sheer Cheekcolour from their Bikini Brights collection is superb in the colour Sunshine – fresh from the beach radiance.

EYES: Extreme Cils Waterproof mascara from Chanel is great for swimming; there is absolutely no smudging. Also from Chanel is a great double-ended pencil with a kohl point on one end and a creamy shadow on the other. This is so practical!

New refreshing cream eye shadow from L'Oreal Paris called Colour Fresco is a dream to apply and will give your eyes an irresistible sparkle – available at all pharmacies in June.

Optimal Cover concealer from Shiseido is one of the best cover-ups I have seen in a while. It's moist, yet water-resistant and stays on until you remove it. It literally covers any discolouration including birthmarks and scars.

Eyebrow Essential Kit from Lise Watier is a perfect petite travel companion. Equipped with two shades of brow powder and all the tools necessary to achieve flawless eyebrows, even an eyebrow map.

LIPS/NAILS: Wait until you see Chanel's new lip gloss in shades called Soda and Gin Fizz with iced nail colour to match – both are must haves this season.

Voile de Nacre is a base and powder for nails from Christian Dior that shimmers delicately as in a midsummer night's dream. This product is very different and fun, fun, fun. Dior also treats us to Multi-Gloss, which brings the lush blush of ripe fruit to lips and cheeks.

Multi-Sensation Velvet Lip colour from Lancôme has some tasty innovations, such as the silkiest, sultriest matte finish possible. It feels weightless and lasts all day.

A great moisturizing lip-care formula from Lancaster called Sheer Lipstick not only protects your lips, but gives them a nice shine for hours. MAC's Eden Rocks collection is fabulous.

Try the colour Dream Vacation and top it up with Crystal Beach gloss – as sexy as sex gets.

HAIR: Daniel Fiorio proprietor of Salon Daniel at 79 Yorkville Ave. in Toronto says hair this season will be most fashionable with contrasting colours.

If you are blond then you will want dark, graduating roots, and if you are dark you can have a variation of lighter colours with a large blond chunk that can be woven through hair, hidden or simply styled together. A truly innovative effect that is definitely a summer happening.

True Calm is a new line of hydrating hair care products from Redken. It strengthens the hair, calms and is excellent for moisturizing a dry scalp.

Shiseido's hair care selection: shampoo for all types of hair, an Intensive Treatment Hair Mask that nourishes right to the core and a Multi-Treatment Hair Lotion Spray that repairs damage from hair dryers.

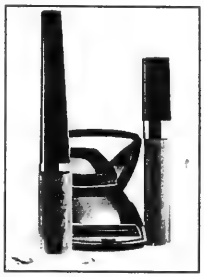
FRAGRANCE: Davidoff introduces Cool Water Functions, which includes eight lifestyle products that will be available in August. The seriously cool part of the packaging is that within every bottle is a techno blue aluminum foil bag that gradually shrinks as the product is used up. This is totally functional, as it not only allows you to see how much is left, but preserves the formula in peak condition until the last drop.

Chanel treats us to a purse-size ladies Allure scent, with refills and all. The scent, of course, is grand, and the convenient little bottle is a treasure. The Men's Allure is also being packaged for the man-on-the-go in a gorgeous little champagne-coloured metal casing with a strong tactile appeal.

Michael Kors, one of the world's hottest fashion designers brings us a new fragrance – Michael. This scent is exquisite, and the bottle – let that be a surprise. It can be purchased via Michael Kors Direct: 1-888-754-2212; sorry, not in Toronto yet.

Ellen Tracy, another fashion guru known for her elegant, feminine designs and soft comfortable fabrics, treats us to a scent to match her brilliant garb. Of course the name is Ellen Tracy. This oriental, spicy fragrance is exceptional in its unique blend of flowers, juicy peach and spices. The flacon resembles a soft and feminine A-line dress.

It is not surprising that LaCoste has created a fresh, sporty, yet sexy new scent. Pampering women is their specialty. This daytime fragrance is like a flower shop with a touch of spice and a hint of iced tea.



Now, for your special guy, Rochas has created Aquaman. This irresistible scent is masculine, strong and sensual – perfect for the man who loves life, and you.

Another treat for your honey is a fabulous new shave foam and soap from Ralph Lauren – the name – Romance.

Versace plans a relatively calm summer

By SHIRA BREUER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The year 2000 was an especially good year for Donatella Versace, with collections that won unending coverage in the media, especially for Jennifer Lopez's green dress, which was dubbed the dress of the year.

Versace's style shone in all its glory in the summer last year and in the winter collection that followed it: rich in exaggerations, kitschy and blatantly defiant of everything accepted as good and nice, the absolute opposite of virtuous style that sanctifies simplicity, elegance and solidity.

The collections Versace sent down the walkway last year not only made a lot of noise, they also spearheaded the "rich bitch" trend so much copied by commercial fashion houses.

Against this background, Versace's summer clothes this year look relatively calm, even though her calm is still hysteria when compared to others.

Versace for summer: An emphasis on the silhouette.

[Photos by Avi Waldman]

Her grandiose designs were somewhat dwarfed in the packed hall in the Sheraton City Tower hotel in Tel Aviv, where Yasmin Reuveni, the Israeli franchisee of the Italian label, put on a show for local customers. Even so, it was impossible not to be impressed by the splendour and by the sensuality and super-feminine style of the clothes.

The new summer collection, designed in the silhouette style of the 1980s, is different from the two collections that preceded it, thanks to the relatively restrained tone, which makes it much more wearable.

The most outstanding innovation is the silhouette form, which emphasizes the waistline with tightly fitted wide belts. The belts at the recent fashion show were worn over soft flowing blouses of jersey, full of little pleats that went a long way to illustrate the fashionable look this summer - wide and rich in soft fabric on top and long narrow on the bottom.

The blouses were mostly black with asymmetric necklines, some off one shoulder and others with long sleeves. They were very beautiful, sexy and interesting, especially when accessorized with black leather belts. Versace used the same fabric - finely knit viscose jersey, a major hit this season - to design sensual evening gowns with long slits and flowing open backs and a lot of movement that easily fit all the body's curves.

There was also a black dress with clean lines and pleats in the back that emphasized the derriere. Although the style and taste of these clothes is debatable, their quality is undeniable.

The prints - abstract splotches of color and giant tropical flowers - ensure that all who wear them will be the centre of attention. The strong colours - deep turquoise and wine red, white, pink, lavender and coral-orange - are a tempting summer option for those who don't crave dominant, though fashionable, black.

The men's clothing in the collection ranges from the wild and crazy to the more wearable and sporty, such as the light summer suit that looks as if it was designed for a dream vacation in the Caribbean, with three-quarter-length white cotton pants and an unbuttoned cotton shirt in pale blue or turquoise.

Despite the abundance of visual stimulation, it was the amazing high heels that managed to draw the most attention. They beat a rhythm on the walkway, winked and sparkled, capturing the audience's heart with coloured satin, pom-poms and gold buckles, and promising discomfort to one's feet but great viewing pleasure.

In about two months the Israeli branch of Versace will move from 14 Hey B'Iyar Street, on one side of Kikar Hamedina, to a location on the other side of the circle, to a new store whose interior design matches that of Versace outlets around the world. Prices - take a deep breath - start at $745 for shoes, jersey blouses and belts and $ 2000 for dresses. T-shirts are less expensive at a mere $150 and jeans-style cotton pants are $180.

Concert a delicate balance of musical genres

By LAURE BAUDOT
Special to The CJN

Pictured [from left] are Cantor Eric Moses, Boris Brott, Alberto Mizrahi, Amy Goldstein and Michael Burgess.

TORONTO — At times fun-loving, at others intense, the recent Yom Ha'atzmaut Gala Concert at the Beth Sholom Synagogue matched the mood of its audience.

Cantor Eric Moses provided a meticulous balance between genres – traditional and non-traditional music, classical opera and Broadway tunes – as well as in tone.

The music varied, with rapid, energetic songs and slower melodies. Moses' talented programming was no doubt greatly responsible for holding the audience's attention for a concert that, at three hours in length, risked being too long.

Moses, a Torontonian and graduate of the Tel Aviv Cantorial Institute, opened the concert with Avinu Shebashamayim – his strongest performance of the evening.

Moses's precise and musical singing speaks to his talent, passion and training. A well-deserved and sustained applause greeted him at the piece's conclusion.

Hazzan Alberto Mizrahi, a Greek-born tenor and chazzan of the Anshe Emet Synagogue in Chicago, contrasted strongly, in figure and in voice, to Moses.

Mizrahi is an enthusiastic and gregarious performer. His love of vocal theatrics – revelling in long musical runs – was perhaps better suited to Yom Ze l'Yisrael than to Tosca's Duet, which he sang with Amy Goldstein.

Mizrahi's Yom Ze Yisrael, sung with gusto, was received enthusiastically by the audience, who clapped along.

Goldstein's soprano offered a delightful counterpoint to the heavier male voices. Trained in opera, art song and oratorio, she has sung with the Brooklyn Philharmonic and the New Philharmonic of New Jersey.

Goldstein sings with precision, musicality and vitality that reflect both her natural ability and vigorous training. An actress as well as a singer, she rendered a striking Tosca in the operatic duet from Puccini's opera performed with Mizrahi. The couple's passionate embrace at the duet's conclusion was acted out on the synagogue's bimah, despite a slightly abashed – but not seriously displeased – audience.

The choir, conducted by Brahm Goldhamer, accompanied many of the pieces, fitting in with the professional musicians flawlessly.

The highlight of the evening was the Naomi Shemer classic Yerushalayim Shel Zahav, arranged by J. Faiman. Alternating between slow and rapid song, between Hebrew, English and Yiddish, the arrangement was an astonishing and innovative rendition of the traditional melody. Using song and spoken word, the piece conveyed the longing for a united Jerusalem in the new form of a mini-oratorio.

Michael Burgess, who played Jean Valjean in the Canadian version of Les Miserables, was the long-anticipated star of the evening. After a subdued beginning, he plunged wholeheartedly into a collection of songs from Broadway musicals, including Chess and Aspects of Love. Sustained applause and a standing ovation greeted his rendition of God on High from Les Miserables.

Toward the end of the concert, Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich spoke, connecting music with the "source of life" and the celebration of a united Jerusalem and commending the musicians and congregation for a combined effort in organizing the evening's concert.

Clearly, the audience agreed with him, for their joyful response to the concert gracefully captured the holiday's intent.

Artists celebrate at Illuminations art reception

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – Sponsors, patrons, and guests were greeted with klezmer music at theIlluminations: Visions of the Poets and Sages art exhibition held recently at the Liss Gallery on Eglinton Ave.W.

Sponsored by Ashkenaz Foundation, in co-operation with UJA Federation as part of a Jewish Toronto Tomorrow initiative, there was a freilech atmosphere at the opening cocktail reception.

Mingling with the guests and volunteers were Canadian artists, Dubi Arie, Laya Crust, Gina Godfrey, Heather Kroll Levine, Lisa Rotenberg, Judy Singer, Pedie Wolfond and Ian Leventhal, the curator of Illuminations.

The exhibition was chaired by husband and wife, Heather and Ron Hoffman.Helen Daniels, president of the Ashkenaz Foundation spoke of the plans for the next festival and thanked the many patrons for their support.

Along with the Ashkenaz Festival which will take place in Toronto's Harbourfront Centre from Aug. 24 to Sept. 2, 2002, the Ashkenaz Foundation presents exciting artistic performances, educational programs and fundraising events throughout the year.

Duo keeps entertaining the kids

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Juno award-winning children's entertainers, Judy & David have lots to celebrate during the last weekend of May.

Their latest album, Songs from the Boom Box, featuring songs from their popular YTV television series, Judy & David's Boom Box, was released. They are performing four family concerts at the City Playhouse in Vaughan, Ont., and, so far, have enjoyed 10 years of wedded bliss.

Judy and David Gershon tape nine four-minute television shows for YTV, that are seen at 1:55 p.m. daily and repeated throughout the week. Each show boasts of an original song composed by the couple.

"David and I realized that in order to reach the audience, we needed that television presence," Judy says.

"It was a great way to do what we were already doing as guests on YTV's Treehouse spots. We would come on and do a little schtick and a song, and it worked well. Our idea is to engage the viewer and get them involved in the song. We liked the idea of having an energy-packed few minutes."

The couple has composed 60 songs for the show's 60 episodes to date, produced over the show's two-year span.

"This is an opportunity to release our fans' favourite songs that have never been released before," says David.

Just like their last two successful albums, Pigmania and GoldiRocks, Songs from the Boom Box is produced in enhanced CD format that you can play on a computer.

This Hotel has a timeless feel

By BEN ROSE
Special to CJN

TORONTO — Lester, the main character, reminds writer Alex Poch-Goldin of Willie Loman in Arthur Miller's Death of A Salesman.

"Lester is an ordinary man nobody pays attention to. He could be Jewish; he is certainly an aspect of me," said Poch-Goldin, 36, whose play This Hotel opened at Theatre Passe Muraille May 10.

Lester leaves an unhappy marriage (he finds his wife in the arms of another man) and checks into a hotel, where through a bellhop (Alon Nashman) who plays eight different characters, he learns ugly aspects of his own life and looks to a future with hope.

Though the hotel has a 1940s feel to it, Poch-Goldin said, This Hotel is "timeless."

The part of Lester is played by Randy Hughson in a reprise of his performance at the Fringe Festival in 1998. The play has been lengthened by 25 minutes since then, to delve more deeply into the characters of Lester, the bellhop, the handyman, the bartender, the manager and the lounge singer, said the playwright.

"The bellhop is like the trickster in aboriginal life, changing shapes all the time."

Poch-Goldin, a transplanted Montrealer, spent 2½ years writing This Hotel, during which time he handled acting chores such as Dr. Posner in Wit and made inroads into TV commercials "to pay the rent."

"When I first arrived in Toronto, I was lucky enough to get a part in Biloxi Blues, but believe me, it wasn't the start of stardom. I wanted to be a writer all my life, writing poetry in high school in Montreal."

He is particularly pleased with the sense of "magic" in the play, in which the set itself, including a bed, becomes a character, as Lester learns more about his subconscious life through the machinations of Nashman, the changing bellhop.

Poch-Goldin gives credit to his wife, Kelly Thornton, co-producer, who was recently named artistic director of Nightwood Theatre, succeeding Alisa Palmer.

"I like to bounce ideas off her because she is very supportive, yet critical," he says.

Planet 88, a theatre company they started, is co-producer of This Hotel, along with TPM.

Poch-Goldin said he likes acting as a respite from his writing, and has appeared in, among other productions, Angels in America.

The son of Velma and Hymie Poch-Goldin, he has a brother, Steph, a set dresser for movies shot in Toronto.

Poch-Goldin trained at the Dome Theatre School in Montreal and the Eugene O'Neill Theatre School in Waterford, Conn., where one of his teachers was the late Morris Carnovsky, a star of Yiddish theatre.

TORONTONIAN RECOUNTS MAURITIUS EPISODE FOR FRENCH DOCUMENTARY

Torontonian Henry Wellisch travelled to Vienna last month to be interviewed for a film documentary about his experiences as one of a group of about 3,000 wartime Jewish refugees from Eastern Europe who were denied entry to Palestine in 1940, and detained on Mauritius, a remote island in the Indian Ocean, until 1945.

Wellisch received two visits from the film's French director at his home in Toronto before being invited to Vienna, his native city. He was filmed in about 10 different locations in the Austrian capital. The filmmakers interviewed other survivors in Mauritius and Israel.

"Filming is hard work," reports Wellisch, a retired technician in his late 70s. "You start early in the morning and you work all day long into the night – as long as there is daylight. Because it's very expensive; there's a big crew and all those people have to be paid. The shooting schedule has to be compressed into as short a time as possible."

One day he was filmed outside his family's former home in an apartment block, from which he had witnessed the destruction of a nearby synagogue on Kristallnacht (Nov. 10, 1938). While they were filming, the building's present owner, an elderly lady, came out to speak with them; she was apparently bristling with suspicions and hostility.

"She was obviously scared that I wanted to get the house back," Wellisch recalls. "She calmed down after a while, but it was not a pleasant experience." (Several young Austrians on the production crew apologized profusely to Wellisch for her behaviour, he says.)

Strangely, it was with full German approval that some 3,500 desperate Jewish refugees, including Wellisch and his parents, sailed down the Danube on four steamers for Palestine in September 1940.

"Maybe they wanted to make trouble for the British in Palestine, because it was an illegal transport," Wellisch suggests.

After a long and difficult voyage the ships reached Haifa, but the British began transferring the passengers onto another ship, the Patria, for immediate deportation. Attempting to thwart this plan, the Jewish underground blew up the Patria; but tragically, the ship capsized, killing 250.

Soon thereafter the remaining refugees were shipped to Mauritius, some 300 miles east of Madagascar, where most survived the war years. "The worst thing was the remoteness of the place. There was no air mail at the time. A letter from England took about three months to arrive. But we had a radio in the camp, and we listened to the BBC in German."

The British attempted to treat the detainees with dignity; Winston Churchill urged that they "should not be incarcerated, but should be gainfully employed." However, many became sick with disease, and 128 died in the four years. In recent years the South African Jewish community has rebuilt the neglected Jewish cemetery on Mauritius, and replaced every tombstone, Wellisch reports.

Permitted to leave in early 1945, Wellisch settled with his parents in Eretz Yisrael, and served in the Haganah before and during the War of Independence. He and his parents came to Canada in 1951.

"I owe my life to Mr. Eichmann," he observes, with understated irony. "There's no question about it, because I think that Eichmann personally had the responsibility of getting this transport of Jewish refugees under way."

After the filming, Wellisch spent several more days in Vienna, meeting with Jewish officials and acquaintances, and visiting archives and cemeteries in hopes of furthering his family tree research. A former president of the Jewish Genealogical Society of Canada, he is a well-known authority on the Jews of the Austro-Hungarian Empire – and the Jews of Mauritius as well.

The documentary's working title, Atlantic Drift, refers to the months when one of the refugee ships, the Atlantic, was adrift in the Mediterranean from lack of fuel and political uncertainties. The director is Michel Daeron. Filaofilms, the Paris-based production company, has not yet indicated its plans for when and how it will be released.

Judy & David release interactive CD

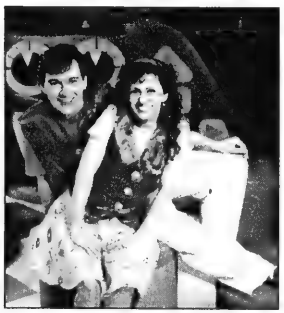
Included is a music video, puzzles, lyrics, animation and colouring sheets.

"Judy and I feel very strongly about our music and about engaging kids and being interactive," he says.

Fans will be able to purchase Songs from the Boom Box for the first time at the Vaughan City Playhouse concerts, which take place on May 26 and 27 at 2 and 4 p.m.

Joining Judy & David onstage for his only live concert appearance is Boomie the Boombox, the purple mascot from their YTV series. Also performing are 25 singing and dancing kids from Shari Quallenberg's CharActors Theatre Troupe.

"Pretty much anytime we've worked with a choir in the Toronto area, it's been Shari Quallenberg's group. We just love working with them. They are really talented kids who love to sing and dance. It's a learning experience for them too. They are part of a theatre school, and this gives them an opportunity to use some of their skills in the real world of entertaining," says David.



Judy and David

In addition to the new songs, favourites from the GoldiRocks album will be included in the one-hour show.

"Every song has something for the audience to do. It is one of our trademarks. We are family entertainers and are very aware of everybody who is in the audience. There is a lot of humour that works for both kids and adults at the same time. I think we really encourage parents to let their hair down and be kids. We work very hard to make sure the parents are well entertained at our concerts," Judy says.

Fans can log on to www.judyanddavid.com and download free things, and learn where to purchase their albums and where to catch their upcoming fall concerts.

The future looks bright for Chicago-born David and Judy, a Torontonian. The couple met in the activities room at Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple – a room they frequent every Saturday after morning services. A second generation of Gershons is already craving the showbiz spotlight; son Jared, 4½, has taken to drumming, and daughter Abigail, 2, loves to entertain with song.

For tickets to their concert at Vaughan City Playhouse, 1000 New Westminster Road in Vaughan, call the box office at 905-709-4057 or Ticketmaster at 416-870-8000.

Ohel Leah Synagogue a jewel in the eye of Hong Kong

By NANCY WIGSTON
Special to The CJN

HONG KONG — The Sabra Coffee Shop in the Jewish Community Centre is gradually filling up with families coming from a talk held a few metres away at Hong Kong's Ohel Leah Synagogue.

The scene resembles those in community halls all over the world: a buffet table laden with chalah, lox, dill pickles, grilled fish and lamb, sweet and sour beef, devilled eggs.

Only the cornucopia of fresh fruits seems to acknowledge the exotic location: tiny finger bananas, passion fruit, fresh lychees and mangosteens.

Kids join their parents, balancing full plates, while people chat, exchange greetings, and discuss Sunday night's talk, The Relevance of Judaism in the 21st Century.

French and English – in both British and American accents – are the languages spoken, reflecting the cosmopolitan nature of both Hong Kong and of this synagogue, where Conservative, Reform and Lubavitchers share the facilities. (A mainly Sephardi Orthodox community has another synagogue at 16-18 MacDonnell St.)

Hong Kong's Jewish community has flourished for well over 100 years. The earliest recorded arrival was Jacob Phillips, a rabbi's son, who arrived from Birmingham in 1803.

The Kadoorie and Sassoon families, sometimes called "the Rothschilds of Asia," highlight the distinguished names who formed the early congregation, many of them multi-lingual Sephardic merchants from Baghdad, Calcutta and Bombay.

By 1900, 165 Jewish families had settled here. The first major Russian immigration occurred after the pogroms around the time of the Russo-Japanese War (1905); the second wave came after the 1917 revolution.

Hong Kong proved a good home to its Jewish population. Sir Matthew Nathan, governor of the colony from 1904-1907, is memorialized today in his namesake, Nathan Road, one of Kowloon's busiest streets, an artery that became vital to Hong Kong's development, despite its early nickname, "Nathan's Folly."

In the 1980s, a number of Diaspora Jews returned to the Chinese cities of Guangzhou, Beijing, and Shanghai; since then, Hong Kong has become a source for their Pesach supplies.

One vivid chapter in the community's history unfolded abruptly after the Japanese invasion in 1938. While Jews fleeing Vienna were aided by exit visas provided by the Chinese consul (Shanghai's Jewish population grew to 20,000 during the war years), the Jews in Hong Kong fared very differently.

After evacuating their women and children to Australia, the men joined the Hong Kong Volunteers. The British were defeated, and the Hong Kong Volunteers were made prisoners of war in Japanese camps. Yet the Jews among them experienced no anti-Semitism while imprisoned. A minyan was formed, and camp prayers were lead by Nathan Rakusem. The Japanese even allowed Jewish prayer books into the camps. Nevertheless, life was hard, each prisoner existing on meagre daily rations: one cigarette, a tin of rice, some boiled lettuce and a little soup.

Today, Ohel Leah Synagogue's membership numbers 238 families, representing an astonishing 17 nationalities, a mirror of the international nature of this city of six and a half million.

The Ohel Leah Synagogue was actually the third to be built in Hong Kong, and is located on some of the best real estate imaginable. Unlike much of Hong Kong – a longtime finalist for the most densely populated place on earth – this Robinson Road property, with its gracious temple, treed landscape and new community centre exudes an oasis-like tranquillity. The winner of the 2000 Asia-Pacific Heritage Award, the restored synagogue is a jewel that reflects the history of Hong Kong Jews.

The Ohel Leah Synagogue's membership numbers 238 families.

The Sassoon brothers, Jacob, Edward and Meyer, sponsored the building as a gift to the community; senior member of Sassoon & Co., Abraham Jacob Raymond, laid its foundation stone on August 7, 1901. The structure was completed the following year.

The Sassoon family had been advisers to the Pasha in Baghdad until they were made unwelcome in the 1830s, and when they came to Hong Kong, they prospered.

The synagogue, named for their mother Leah – the name literally translates as "Leah's tent" – embodies in its style both the family's Sephardic and colonial roots. Before the explosion of high rise construction in mid-20th century Hong Kong, the synagogue property boasted "spacious, well-kept tropical gardens with splendid harbour views," as a visiting rabbi from Philadelphia wrote home in 1912.

Today those views may be obscured by the two new towers of the JCC, home to a 10-classroom school, play area, swimming pool, library, auditoria, health centre and kosher restaurant; nonetheless the Ohel Leah Synagogue, with its creamy exterior and rich wood-panelled interior, remains the place where Jews in Hong Kong come to meet, mingle and worship.

Social work said similar to Jewish values

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Due to government cutbacks in social services, the health sector and to schools, it is becoming more and more difficult to be a social worker, says a professor of social work at Ryerson Polytechnic University.

"When there are less resources, child poverty goes up, homelessness goes up, and the social worker gets caught in the middle," says Ben Carniol, author of Case Critical: Challenging Social Services in Canada.

Carniol, 63, was born in Czechoslovakia in 1935. His parents were killed in the Holocaust, and a non-Jewish family brought him up as Catholic.

"I always knew I was Jewish, and those people brought me up with love," he said. "Despite the horror of the Holocaust and the murder of my parents, I was brought up with enough affection and love to draw on until today. I have two daughters who went to Hebrew day school, and I feel comfortable being linked with the Jewish community."

Carniol, who has been in the social work field for more than 35 years, says that front line social workers often deal with clients whose morale is quite low. "Society places a huge amount of blame on the poor, and that attacks their self worth and undermines their motivation.

"The more they are accused, the more they believe they are less worthy, that they are less of a citizen, and that they deserve few rights," says Carniol, who has revised his book for the fourth time since it was first published in 1987.

He has seen some "creative responses" by social workers who have "looked not only at the disadvantaged, but who have looked at the total picture of how power is exercised in society."

When we look at society as a whole, he says, we see a number of structured inequalities created by the power system based on such things as gender or colour. "Peoples' life chances differ based on whether they are aboriginal, have a disability, or whether they are rich or poor."

Once we recognize that, he says, "we begin to notice that people with less power often bond together into social movements.

"People come together like this because they share experiences, such as being abused women or being homeless. When they talk, they realize that [society has not kept its promises to them], and they can decide together what to do."

When social workers work with such groups, says Carniol, "they begin to notice that people do have motivation to improve their own situation and improve the social condition."

Members of the group feel stronger because they recognize that they have been treated unfairly, he says. "Social workers can help individuals in these situations to reframe how their problem is seen. This frees up the individual's energy to move out [of the situation]. The social worker can support such changes as better day care, or stiffer laws for deadbeat dads."

As social workers become involved, he says, "they not only provide a service to the individual, they help to achieve greater social justice."

When social workers know they are making a contribution, it also helps their morale, says Carniol, because they see they can make a difference. "This is a new kind of professionalism. They are moving away from the paternal where the professional has all the answers, and towards a team environment in which the client feels that the social worker is open to listening, that he understands the full picture, and that he is on their side.

"It is difficult to be a government worker, but if the social worker adopts this approach then the client's perception changes."

It not only depends on the social worker to act this way, but also on the social worker's agency or organization to be open to these kind of linkages between the community and community members, says Carniol.

Social work "is about caring for others," he says. "There are those who emphatically follow the rules, but on the other side, there are those who have a deep human quality that is not taught. They are the ones who reach out and care about others."

One of his hobbies, says Carniol, is reading about Jewish ethics. "They support the social work values of caring. I feel good about being Jewish; Jewish values are about social justice and treating people with respect. Social work has a lot in common with Jewish values."

BAYCREST CHALLENGE: Adam (left) and Elan get pumped up and ready to run the Kids Mother's Day Mile, a new event added to this year's Baycrest Challenge on May 13. Close to 1,500 runners and walkers turned out for the annual fund raiser. Organizers hoped to raise $160,000 for Baycrest Centre.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. My kids love cheese and crackers. Does hard cheese have a lot of calcium?

A. Yes, one ounce of hard cheese contains 200 to 300 mg of calcium, approximately 30 percent of the average daily requirement.

Q. I am a vegetarian and someone told me that there is a grain that is a complete protein. Is this true and what is it called?

A. Yes it is true and fabulous. It is called quinoa (pronounced keen-wa) and it is a complete protein. It looks like mini-barley or rice. It is great with stir frys, in wraps, in soups or on its own used like rice. Quinoa is available in most major grocery stores now.

Disturbing video is not for everyone

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

Requiem For A Dream, a dark, disturbing film about drug addiction and loneliness, features a brilliant performance by Ellen Burstyn, and was recently released on video.

Director Darren Aronofsky, whose debut film, Pi, won critical acclaim, was highly praised for this film, although it should be pointed out that this film will not appeal to everyone.

It tells the story of a single mother, Sara Goldfarb (Burstyn), and her aimless son, Harry (Jared Leto), and is set in the Coney Island area of New York. Harry is constantly looking for a new adventure to fill his lonesome life. Even his girlfriend, Marian Silver (Jennifer Connelly), can't satisfy all his needs, and eventually Harry and his friend, Tyrone (Marlon Wayans), go from drug users to small-time drug dealers.

Things go downhill from there and become more explicit than some people will want to see.

Meanwhile, Sara, who is addicted to television quiz shows, may be offered the opportunity to appear on one. She realizes that she has outgrown her favourite dress, and decides to go on a dangerous diet. As a result of her determination to lose weight, she becomes dependent on prescription drugs, and her mind begins to wander.

Requiem For A Dream deals with the search for love and purpose in life, and highlights the dangerous consequences drug abuse.

Another recently released video is a "B" film that probably never saw the inside of a theatre, at least not in Canada.

Brooklyn Babylon is about the tensions and conflicts that arise between an Orthodox Jewish community and a Black community in Brooklyn.

Tensions escalate when two cars collide one night. One car contains three young Jewish militants and the one of their girlfriends. The second car contains a young Black rapper and his activist friend.

The rapper and the girl begin meeting, and a clandestine relationship develops between them. Violence breaks out when the boyfriend learns of this relationship.

The film is not particularly well done, nor is it particularly appealing, although Karen Globerman as Sara, the Jewish girl, and Tariq Trotter, as the rapper, have a certain screen presence. Most of the characters are very stereotyped and one- dimensional.

For something a little more uplifting and appealing, you might want to rent What's Cooking, a delightful film about four families of different ethnic backgrounds, and how they celebrate American Thanksgiving.

This film did not make it into Canadian theatres, but I definitely recommend it.

It covers about 24 hours in the lives of these four families, but it reveals a great deal about them in that short span of time.

There is a Vietnamese family that pressures the children to do well in school and respect their parents.

There is a Black family that is going through an internal crisis. There is a Latino family, the parents of which have just split up, and there is a Jewish family that has trouble accepting the daughter's life choices.

What's Cooking features an all-star cast that includes Joan Chen, Julianna Margulies, Mercedes Ruehl, A. Martinez, Kyra Sedgwick, Maury Chaykin, Alfre Woodard, Lainie Kazan and Estelle Harris.

This is a video that will leave you feeling good about the world around you.

The Jewish presence on the diamond

BY HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Jewish baseball players have dotted pro baseball rosters ever since the earliest box scores were tracked in the 1850s. The brothers Boaz and Lipman E. Pike were among the first mentioned.

In more modern times, along came the likes of Hank Greenberg, Al "Flip" Rosen, Sid Gordon, Kenny Holtzman, Sandy Koufax, Barry Latman, Mike Epstein, Art Shamsky, Saul Rogovin, and Canadian Goody Rosen, who was born in Toronto.

The tradition continues now in the 21st century, with the likes of Shawn Green, Gabe Kapler, Al Levine, Mike Lieberthal, Brad Ausmus, Scott Radinsky, Scott Schoeneweis, and a few others battling to ascend from the minors.

Green, 28, is back for his second year with the Los Angeles Dodgers. By most standards the right fielder had a decent season in 2000. He batted .269, slammed 24 home runs and drove in another 99 runs. Not bad, but not sufficient when you're labelled the big bopper and paid $84 million over six seasons.

The former Toronto Blue Jays first-round selection is one of only four Jewish players to have driven in 100 runs in a season. He did it twice. Hank Greenberg accomplished the feat seven times, Al Rosen five, and Sid Gordon three.

Green, who has his own Web site, has become involved with the L.A. Jewish community. He is often called upon to participate in fund-raising events and to make guest appearances.

Texas outfielder Gabe Kapler, 25, originally a Detroit Tiger, figures prominently in the Rangers' plans for 2001. Last season, Gabe (sometimes referred to as Babe) hit .302, slugged 14 taters and drove in 66 runs. He enjoyed a club record 28-game hitting streak.

With his impressive build, he has become somewhat of an idol and he's appeared on the cover of fitness magazines. Kapler spends hours in the weight room, suggesting he has the power to double his home run output.

Surprisingly, there was talk all winter that he might be traded, since the Rangers, despite their potent lineup, are pitching poor. More than a few teams inquired about his availability.

Al Levine, 32, a lefty, is coming off an impressive season with the Anaheim Angels. He appeared in 51 games as a reliever and while he posted a 3-4 record, his 3.87 ERA in these inflationary times is not to be viewed lightly. The veteran Levine finally hit the jackpot when the Angels agreed in late January to a $750,000 contract, up from $270,000 the previous year.

Levine, who started one game last season, sat on the injury list from July1 to Aug. 19 due to irritation of the elbow. The former White Sox and Ranger demonstrated that perseverance pays.

Scott Schoeneweis pitched a lot of innings last year (170) while compiling a 7-10 mark and an ERA of 5.45 with Anaheim.The 27-year-old is a lefty, which increases his value.

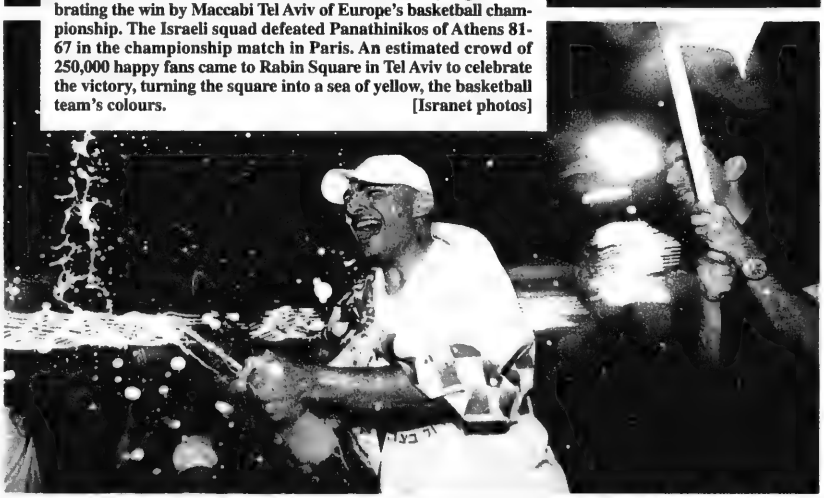
One of the top catchers in baseball is Phillies mainstay Mike Lieberthal, whose father is Jewish. Last season, in only 389 at bats, Lieberthal hit .278, slugged 15 homers and drove in 71 runs. He earned his second straight all-star berth but never quite recovered from a sprained ankle he suffered in mid-July from a home plate collision.

Brad Ausmus, 32, a highly-regarded reliever, was re-acquired by Houston from Detroit in the off-season in a six-player swap. The Astros pitching staff was outraged when he was traded to Detroit two years ago.

Considered one of the top defensive catchers in the game and possessing an exceptional ability to handle pitchers, Ausmus hit .266 last season, banged out seven homers and drove in 51 runs. Rare for backcatchers, he stole 11 bases. He is also very adept at throwing out base runners (32 of 74).

Scott Radinsky, 32, was limited to a single relief appearance with the St. Louis Cardinals last season because of elbow problems. The left-hander had "Tommy John" surgery in the off season and is in the Cleveland Indians' camp. A career record of 42-25, 52 saves, and a 3.34 ERA in 555 games over 10 seasons would indicate he is worth taking a risk on.

On the cusp, so to speak, are Cincinnati Reds pitcher Keith Glauber, Atlanta Braves hurler Jason Marquis, Eddie Zosky, a utility infielder with the Houston Astros, pitcher Andrew Lorraine, who was recently signed by the AAA Calgary Cannons, and second sacker David Newhan in the Philadelphia Phillies chain.



ISRAEL CHEERS MACCABI HEROES: All of Israel, it seemed, flowed onto the streets last week, Tuesday night, celebrating the win by Maccabi Tel Aviv of Europe's basketball championship. The Israeli squad defeated Panathinikos of Athens 81-67 in the championship match in Paris. An estimated crowd of 250,000 happy fans came to Rabin Square in Tel Aviv to celebrate the victory, turning the square into a sea of yellow, the basketball team's colours. [Israel photos]

מאת: יעל זליגר

מפתח הלב*; סתבה: נירה הראל, אייר: יוסי אבולעפיה
(הוצאת זברה הפקות)

יגומי, נומי, ילדתי!...
אבא הלך לעבודה...
אבא הלך אל הכרם...
אבא הלך אל הפרדס...
אבא הלך אל חשדה..." (מתוך ישיר ערש, מאת: יחיאל הילפרין)

שאני אוהב יותר לאכול את
אלה שקונים במכולת."

About Food

By NORENE GILLETZ

On Shavuot, we eat dairy foods such as blintzes, kugels and cheesecake. I didn't have to search very far to find a delicious cake for your Shavuot table! This recipe has been adapted from the award-winning 700-page cookbook In the Sweet Kitchen – The Definitive Guide to the Baker's Pantry by Toronto pastry chef Regan Daley.

Daley provides excellent information and tips on baking, ingredients and substitutions. There are 140 scrumptious and colour photos, including Caramel Apple and Sweet Cream Cheesecake, and Black Chocolate Espresso Cake with Bittersweet Glaze! Enjoy this moist banana cake with its sweet, extra-creamy icing!

BANANA-STRAWBERRY LAYER CAKE

Ingredients should be at room temperature.

Cake layers:
¾ cup unsalted butter
1 cup sugar
2 large eggs
1 tsp. vanilla
1⅓ cups mashed overripe bananas (about 3 large)
2 cups cake-and-pastry flour
¾ tsp. baking soda
¼ tsp. salt
⅓ cup full-fat sour cream

Cream cheese icing:
1 lb. cream cheese
½ cup unsalted butter
500-gm package (about 4 to 4⅓ cups) icing sugar, sifted
1½ tsp. vanilla
1 tsp. fresh lemon juice
1 quart fresh ripe strawberries

Preheat oven to 350. Grease and flour 2 9-inch round cake pans. Cream butter and sugar until light and fluffy, about 2 minutes. Add eggs one at a time, beating well after each addition. (Don't worry if batter separates.) Add vanilla and bananas; blend well.

Sift together dry ingredients. Add half to banana mixture; blend briefly. Scrape down bowl and beat in sour cream. Add remaining flour mixture, stirring just until mixed. Pour batter into pans.

Bake on centre rack of oven at 350 for 25 to 30 minutes. Cool for 5 to 7 minutes. Invert onto a cake rack; cool completely.

Beat cream cheese and butter until smooth and creamy, about 1½ minutes. Sift in icing sugar 1 cup at a time. Beat in vanilla and lemon juice. Cover and refrigerate 15 minutes (or up to 2 days).

Spread one layer with a generous amount of icing. Refrigerate 15 minutes. Reserve 10 to 12 berries for garnishing. Hull remaining berries; cut in thirds lengthwise and arrange over frosted layer. Cover with unfrosted layer. Press down gently so it will adhere. Spread top and sides with remaining icing. Refrigerate up to 24 hours. Garnish with reserved berries up to 6 hours before serving. Makes 10 to 12 servings.

More than 10,000 people showed their support for Israel last week by taking part, on Yom Yerushalayim, in the Israel Funwalk 2001. The event raised some $200,000. and was organized by UJA FEDERATION. Please see page 30 for more photos. [Frances Kraft photo]

Now more than ever, we must support Israel

How rousing and deeply inspiring is the sight of thousands of people marching in their respective communities publicly, visibly, proudly demonstrating their support of Israel. More than any time in the last quarter-century, such support is more vital than ever.

Editorial

The struggle against Israel has moved into a new phase. Palestinians refer to the current violence they unleashed eight months ago as their war of independence. That it is an absolutely unnecessary war is a detail Palestinian leaders refuse to acknowledge, let alone disclose to their people. But as they and the Western world know, Palestinian independence awaited merely the signing of a document last July.

Perhaps Yasser Arafat felt independence won by wielding a pen was somehow less worthy than independence won by wielding a gun. Or perhaps, as is more likely the truth, Arafat knows the "independence" he really seeks, namely, over the entire territory of Israel, is unachievable in any event, by pen or by gun. And thus, he chose what, for him, was achievable and more familiar than the idea of peace: renewed pressure on Israel through the constant threat of terror, mayhem and insecurity.

The price Arafat is willing to pay for this "achievement" is not measured only in time. It is, deliberately, cynically, measured in the blood and dead bodies of his own people.

After some eight months of violence, the barrage of violent images pierces the Western psyche deeper as the commentary accompanying those images misleads even further.

Montreal's 'venerable figure' dies

Maxwell Cummings, 103

MONTREAL — Maxwell Cummings, one of Canada's and the Montreal Jewish community's most venerable figures, died on May 23, at the age of 103.

Cummings was the last surviving member of a sibling community dynasty that included brothers Ralph, Nathan, Harold and Ben, and a sister, Minnie Abbey. He was pre-deceased by his wife, Victoria, and his son Jack, but is survived by another son, Robert.

Cummings' name and beneficence earned him respect and admiration across the country. He was a co-founder of Allied Jewish Community Services (now FEDERATION CJA) and was an involved supporter of scores of other Jewish, civic, and cultural institutions.

A native of New Brunswick who became one of Canada's most successful real estate developers, Cummings was the principal benefactor of the Cummings House and the Golden Age Centre, the Cummings Family Pavilion of Medical Sciences at the Jewish General Hospital, and the rebuilt Montreal Museum of Fine Arts, which named an auditorium in his honour.

He was also invested during his life with the Order of Canada and Order of Quebec. A full obituary will appear in the June 7 issue of The CJN.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Joe Shoctor Dies

EDMONTON — Community leader Joe Shoctor died here recently at the age of 78. Shoctor was remembered as the founder of one of Canada's leading professional theatres, the Citadel Theatre, and played a key role in bringing the Edmonton Eskimos into the Canadian Football League. Most recently, he was building chair of Edmonton's new modern Orthodox congregation, Beth Israel Synagogue.

ISRAEL

Davis Honoured

HAIFA — The University of Haifa will confer an honorary doctorate on Toronto textile manufacturer and philanthropist Michael Davis at a ceremony June 3. Davis is being cited for his leadership in the Jewish community and the Canadian textile industry, and in recognition of his longstanding support of the university and its Canadian friends. Davis is president and CEO of the textile firm Snugabye, as well as president and CEO of Greytown Holdings.

Ethiopians Remember

JERUSALEM — Ethiopian immigrants held a ceremony here last week in memory of those who died en route to Israel over the past two decades. The event was part of a weeklong celebration for Ethiopian immigrants on the 10th anniversary of Operation Solomon, the airlift of Ethiopian Jews to Israel.

WORLD

Demjanjuk Trial

CLEVELAND — A court here has ruled that John Demjanjuk, once mistaken for the sadistic death camp guard "Ivan the Terrible," must stand trial again in an an effort by the U.S. government to strip him of his citizenship. In 1986, Demjanjuk was extradited to Israel for trial, and found guilty. He was sentenced to death, but was later freed when evidence showed he was a victim of mistaken identity.

Jews Celebrate

MOSCOW — Thousands of Jews gathered here this month at a public garden rented by the Israeli Embassy to celebrate the unification of Jerusalem after the 1967 Six Day War. The event, sponsored by major Jewish organizations, featured concerts and an appearance by Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres.

Resolution On Get

NEW YORK — The rabbinic organization for North American centrist Orthodoxy has urged its synagogues to punish those who deny their spouses a Jewish divorce, or get. The Rabbinical Council of America's resolution, which allows communities to withhold synagogue membership or deny honours without first waiting for a ruling from rabbinic courts, is expected to help agunot, Jewish women unable to obtain a religious divorce.

Exhumations Put Off

WARSAW — Poland's justice minister says he is postponing the exhumation of the remains of up to 1,600 Jewish victims of a 1941 massacre until he can confer with Jewish leaders. The exhumation had been requested by the National Remembrance Institute, a government body investigating the massacre in the Polish town of Jedwabne. But some Jewish groups say disturbing the dead violates Jewish values.

Haider Muzzled

VIENNA — An Austrian court has issued a ruling ordering far-right leader Joerg Haider not to repeat remarks he made implying that Jewish leader Ariel Muzicant engages in dubious business practices. Haider attacked Muzicant during the campaign for Vienna municipal elections earlier this year using a term that roughly translates as "having skeletons in the closet." The Vienna court said the term was untrue and damaging to the plaintiff.

Jews Protest

LONDON — British Jews are protesting a proposed real estate development near the site of one of the worst massacres of Jews in English history. An official with the Board of Deputies says the planned $84-million leisure and shopping centre near Clifford's Tower in York, where the city's Jewish community of about 150 took refuge from a mob in 1190, will "diminish the historical and spiritual impact of the tower." Many of the Jews took their own lives in the attack; the rest were burned to death when the tower was set on fire, or killed when they fled the inferno.

Canada Endorses Mitchell Report

OTTAWA — Foreign Affairs minister John Manley last week said Canada supports the Mitchell Report on the Mideast conflict.

Released May 21, the report, based on a fact-finding mission led by former U.S. senator George Mitchell, makes recommendations aimed at helping Israelis and Palestinians resolve the current impasse and return to the negotiating table.

"Canada fully endorses the Mitchell Report, which closely mirrors our own policies," Manley said in a prepared statement. "I believe the parties should use the recommendations contained in this document as a basis to end the senseless cycle of violence."

The report places responsibility for the crisis on both parties and makes several recommendations, including an immediate ceasefire, an Israeli freeze on settlement activity and a Palestinian crackdown on terrorism and incitement.

Manley noted that he raised those very issues with the parties during his recent visit to the Middle East.

"I made it very clear to the Israelis and Palestinians that both must take immediate actions to end the hostilities and create the atmosphere necessary to restart negotiations."

He underlined the urgency of resolving the situation, given the recent escalation in fighting, including the terrorist bombing in Netanya and Israel's use of F-16s against Palestinian targets. He noted that both parties must condemn acts of terrorism and refrain from escalating the conflict any further.

Israel has said it supports the report, except for its call to freeze construction and expansion of Jewish settlements on the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Jewish parents speak out on proposed tax credit

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The provincial government's proposed tax credit for parents who send their children to private schools continues to be a controversial issue.

At last week's meeting of the Toronto District School Board (TDSB), a resolution was passed that called on Ontario Premier Mike Harris to "withdraw the proposed Equity in Education Tax Credit until full public hearings and research have determined it will not place the public education system at risk."

The resolution, submitted by Marguerite Jackson, director of education and secretary-treasurer of TDSB, states that the proposed credit will reduce the board's funding by $6,800 for every student leaving the system for private schools – a net savings to the government of $3,300 per student.

Ed Morgan, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, said, however, that "the government has promised that the tax break will not be to the detriment of public schools. CJC advocates an increase in resources for public schools as well. This is not an either/or issue."

Two Jewish trustees, Shelly Laskin and Gerri Gershon strongly supported the board's motion to withdraw the tax credit, and agreed that independent schools are a threat to public schools, said CJC executive director Bernie Farber, who attended the meeting.

"Some of their words left a sour taste in my mouth. It was unpleasant. As a member of the Jewish community, I was very disappointed," he said.

Sheine Mankovsky, trustee for Ward 5, was the "single solitary voice in support of the needs of parents who send their children to private schools.

"She displayed courage and dignity and identified herself strongly as a Jew. She spoke with great passion in support of a system that would give parents some financial relief," Farber said.

At a press conference last week at Queen's Park, Joanne Naiman, a sociology professor at Ryerson Polytechnic University, said she and two other parents called the conference because they felt "that the silent majority in faith-based communities were not being heard.

"The government's initiative to give tax credits will ultimately affect an already diminished public education system," Naiman said.

It might be time, she said, to question the issue of the public funding of Catholic schools. "Nothing is forever in government policy. In the meantime, we are looking at a government that is shifting to a private model of education."

In response to Naiman's claim that her group represents the "silent majority," Morgan said that "polls conducted by Environics and Focus Ontario in the 1990s showed that 54 percent of the general population and 83 percent of the Jewish population support public funding for all religious schools equal to the Catholic schools."

Georganne Burke, secretary of the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools and a member of Jewish Parents for Equality in Education Funding and the multi-faith Ontario Parents for Equality in Education Funding, said that "it is not apparent to me that they are the silent majority.

"I have been working intensely on the issue for three years, and I have talked to people in every part of the community. Most people understand the [importance] of Jewish education. Our community is bearing a huge [financial] burden."

Private schools will get only 50 percent of what the public and Catholic schools are getting, she said, "but that is still a big step. It shows there has been a fundamental change in the mindset of the government."

In last week's NOW magazine, Carly Steinman, social action co-ordinator at the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism (CCRJ), opposed the tax credit.

However, in a letter submitted to NOW, Rabbi Sharon Sobel, CCRJ's executive director, said that "unfortunately, the position of CCRJ on fair funding was misrepresented.

An intricate love

From the editor's desk

At the crest of a small promontory on Virginia Drive in the southeastern part of Ottawa, one finds Machzikei Hadas.

The synagogue's brown brick exterior is not only one of the its external supportive structures, it is also its interior decorative motif. The deep earthen colour of the brick inside the building provides a sense of security and calm, modesty and warmth.

The impact of the shul's architecture is a perfect replication of the impact of the shul's rabbi, Reuven Bulka.

Rabbi Bulka is the rare individual whom God puts on earth every few hundred years or so to ensure that the spin of the planet around its invisible, intricate axis tilts always heavenward toward the divinely intended ratios of balance and love that only a handful of people truly understand.

No effort for Rabbi Bulka on behalf of an individual or a cause is too imposing or too trivial.

Like most rabbis who are teachers, Rabbi Bulka imparts a dvar Torah to his congregants every Shabbat and Yom tov. He stands in the middle of the bimah, his hands, at the beginning of the sermon, folded one in the other, overhanging the edge of the Torah reader's table.

Very soon in the sermon, however, his hands sweep through the air, punctuating and underlining his remarks. Occasionally, in the classic pose of a man refining his thought, one of his hands supports his chin, temporarily hiding his neatly trimmed vandyke.

Ten or twenty times during the sermon, he adjusts his black kippah to a different position on his head.

He reads no notes. He speaks from his sizable heart, sharing Torah insights that, more often than not, focus on the psychological, emotional, developmental challenges of the human condition.

Always, when he speaks, sitting to his left, in the front row of the women's section, is his wife Naomi.

Enthralled with the animated, enthusiastic rabbi merely feet away from her on the bimah, Naomi fixes an adoring gaze on him while he addresses his congregants, among whom she obviously counts herself. She laughs at his jokes and chuckles at his puns, even though she has likely heard them before. And, like the rest of his congregants, when the rabbi has concluded the dvar Torah, she is moved.

Like a laser of light in a darkened room, the connection between the rabbi and his wife is plain for all to see, a symmetry of perfection.

But now, alas, that symmetry, will be only for memory to recall.

On May 19, Naomi Bulka passed away in a hospital in Washington, D.C. no longer able to resist the final, fatal encroachment of a deadly cancer into her body. She was 55 years old.

Two days later, on Sunday, May 21, when the sky was high and deep blue and a gentle breeze cooled the air, hundreds upon hundreds of friends and acquaintances came to Machzikei Hadas to pay their last respects to her and to help, however possibly, her husband, their rabbi, bear his grief.

Some 32 years earlier, a young Rabbi Reuven Bulka and an even younger Naomi, a Montrealer from the famous, much-respected, Jakobovits family, settled in Ottawa.

In building their lives together, they also helped to build a community. They eventually raised five children; one died in early infancy.

Where the rabbi was outgoing and a high profile public figure, Naomi was reserved, even shy and very private.

In 1998, she was diagnosed with breast cancer.

In her quiet resolute manner, she overcame that illness. In doing so; ironically, she stepped outside of her normally quiet character. In a poignant article written by Cynthia Nyman Engel entitled Caring Friends And Family Mean So Much When Illness Strikes, (Ottawa Regional Cancer Centre Foundation, Challenge, fall/winter 1999), she spoke candidly about her personal and her family's response to the disease.

"I was surprised at how much it meant that people did ask about me and cared," she told Engel. "I had full support from my husband who always accompanied me to all my medical appointments and chemotherapy treatments. But to have so many other people calling from everywhere..., for two minute 'how are you' conversations, was wonderful."

Rabbi Bulka was the last person to speak at the funeral service. His head was bowed, his voice distinct but not much more than a whisper.

"We are devastated," he began.

Typical of this man, his first concern was for the 1,500 people who sat sadly and silently before him, hanging on his words.

"You all had a terrible frustration because you wanted to know what you could do, and there was so little you could do. But somehow you found ways."

The rabbi bravely recounted the course of his wife's tragic disease. Then in a tearful echo of Naomi's words almost three years earlier in Challenge, he said, "I know you all care enough to know."

From where I sat, I could not see if, by force of habit, Rabbi Bulka looked over to the seat merely feet away where Naomi sat every Shabbat and Yom tov.

The seat was empty.

Taliban ruling 'chilling reminder' of Nazi times

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Outrage, combined with chilling reminders of the Nazi era, resonated across the Jewish world with last week's edict from the ruling Taliban in Afghanistan, which will force the country's Hindus to wear yellow-coloured markings on their clothing to identify them as non-Muslims.

For Jews, the issue is obvious – a spine-tingling reminder of Holocaust years when Jews in Germany and Nazi-conquered lands were forced to don yellow cloth stars of David with the word "Jew" in the middle.

In addition to being forced to wear saffron-coloured identity labels, reports from India said last week that from now on, Hindus in Afghanistan will have to drape their homes in a two-metre yellow cloth. As well, they will not be allowed to live with Muslims, and are reportedly barred from building new temples.

Keith Landy, president of Canadian Jewish Congress, said the development is "a chilling reminder" of Nazi times. "Such laws are never passed for the benefit of the minority affected. This is the kind of 'protection' that minorities have to be protected from, and serves mainly to make them targets either of the authorities or of populations incited to hatred," Landy said in a statement.

Canada has condemned the development, and has promised to take it up with Taliban leaders.

Estimates of the number of Hindus in Afghanistan vary widely, from a few hundred, to 5,000.

The edict is the latest move from the hardline Taliban, which controls 95 percent of Afghanistan. To date, the ultra-conservative Sunni rulers have employed a harsh interpretation of Islam to outlaw education for all girls over eight year old, bar women from most employment, and force them to wear the all-concealing burqua. Women also cannot go out in public unless accompanied by a close male relative. Television, films and videos have been outlawed, as have all kinds of non-religious music.

In March, in a move that provoked international outrage, Taliban fighters used rockets and grenades to demolish two ancient statues of Buddha that had been carved into tall cliff walls, claiming they were "idolatrous." The country has also been isolated for sheltering Saudi fugitive Osama bin Laden, who's wanted in connection with a string of international terrorist attacks.

The latest edict came from the country's Minister for the Promotion of Virtue and Prevention of Vice, who ruled that "the non-Muslim population of the country should have a distinctive mark such as a piece of cloth attached to their pocket so they can be differentiated from others."

The edict will also require Hindu women to wear the burqua.

The state-run news agency said the measure is intended "to prevent disturbance to non-Muslim citizens," who might be stopped by authorities who routinely check for violations of Islamic law.

CJC called on Canada "to take all possible steps to convey to the Taliban government the abhorrence of the Canadian people," and to ensure that "this odious measure be rescinded immediately."

Canada is "deeply disturbed" by the proposal, Foreign Affairs minister John Manley said in a prepared statement. Discrimination based on religion "is an affront to values held by all Canadians," Manley stated.

Canada's high commissioner in Islamabad, Pakistan, will be "raising this issue" with Taliban diplomats and with senior officials in Pakistan's foreign ministry, who have regular contact with the Taliban, Manley said.

Jewish organizations all over North America, including the World Jewish Congress, Simon Wiesenthal Centre, and the Reform movement, condemned the development, as did Canadian Muslim groups.

"It bothers me as a Jew that after the Holocaust, people still want to identify someone by a patch they wear," said Michael Rosenberg, president of Jewish Holocaust Survivors of Canada. "That any group can again come up with the idea is outrageous."

Rosenberg hopes Canada and the international community will lodge strong protests with the Taliban.

"It's a terrible case of history repeating itself," sighed Gerda Frieberg, a well-known local Holocaust educator and survivor. "A special ID. What's next?"

Asked what can be done, Frieberg said, "At least we can make some noise. It would be more than the world did for us."

The Taliban said no decision had been made yet on how Hindus would identify themselves, but that the move is required by Islam: "Religious minorities living in an Islamic state must be identified," a spokesperson said.

The special edict is meant for Hindus only because the country's Sikhs can be identified by their turbans, government sources were quoted as saying. There are no Christians left in the country, and just one Jew – a 60-year-old rabbi, Yitzhak Levi, the caretaker of the last synagogue in Kabul, the capital.

Most of the 70 to 80 Jewish families in Afghanistan fled after the Soviet invasion in 1979, and the last dozen or so left during the guerrilla clashes of the following decade. Levi's family is now living in Israel.

A recent article in the Jerusalem Report said Levi was jailed last year for 40 days following a dispute over a Torah scroll. While in prison, Levi said he was forced to recite verses from the Koran. The World Jewish Congress believes Levi is now left more or less alone, and is allowed to care for the synagogue.

In January, the Taliban warned of the death penalty for anyone who converts from Islam to another religion, and for any non-Muslims found proselytizing. The Taliban accused other faiths, particularly Christianity and Judaism, of trying to convert Muslims and of seeking to "eliminate pure Islam."

True picture of life in West Bank not being told, says settler

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — North American Jews have very little perception of what is really going on in the Jewish settlements in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, says a resident of Ma'ale Amos, a yishuv in the hills of Judea.

"Every evening, North Americans hear on the news that Israelis are responding with tanks and helicopters to sporadic shooting incidents and to Arab teenagers who throw rocks at Israeli soldiers," said Israel Danziger, who moved to Israel from New York 28 years ago.

He was in Toronto and New York recently to speak about life on the yishuvim. He was also raising the profile of Mishmeret Yesha, a movement for Jewish sovereignty of Israel.

Among the organization's mandates, it provides protective equipment for settlers, helps plant trees in and around existing yishuvim, and provides legal help for residents of the area who have been arrested while defending themselves, and for those who have not been properly compensated for damaged property.

What people do not hear about, he said, is that the roads, particularly those leading to the outlying settlements, are completely under Arab control. "[Our] roads have turned into a living hell," said Danziger, 48, who has a wife, eight children, and one grandchild.

"Besides the usual array of rocks and molotov cocktails that have existed for years, we now have roadside bombing, and sniping from all directions," he said.

When these things happen the army automatically shuts the roads, and settlers cannot come and go, he said. "What this means is that if we go to work, we don't know if we can come back; the children may not go to school; and we cannot get food. Everything becomes a big question mark."

Israel Danziger

Also part of everyday life is the disruption of the water and electricity supply, "especially on Thursday night when people are beginning to prepare for Shabbat.

"Furthermore, the electric company, which is responsible for repairs, will not send help until it has co-ordinated a complete military operation that includes several jeeps, at least one armoured carrier and two dozen soldiers."

People cry about the Arab towns that come under siege from time to time, said Danziger, "but the reality is that we are under siege all the time.

"The Arabs have built a network of roads through which they can travel even when the main roads are closed. We see them in our area getting around at all hours of the day and night."

This situation has been going on for some time, said Danziger, and since September it has gotten considerably worse. "People who have been tracking the situation since the beginning of the so-called Oslo peace process know that the situation will only get worse. They believe it is only a matter of time until it will be impossible for us to get to work. We will have to find the means to sustain ourselves on our yishuvim."

The army and the police do not travel in the area unless they are in bulletproof vehicles, he said, "and most people try to use the bus. Some of us, however, need our cars, and our cars are not bulletproof."

The yishuvim have begun to lend protective equipment – a helmet and vest – to settlers who have to travel, said Danziger, "but the price of each set is $1,700 (US)."

The yishuvim also need generators; communication, medical and optical equipment; long-term food supplies; water and fuel supplies; and "an array of other items to sustain the yeshuvim during this prolonged guerrilla war."

It is clear, said Danziger, "that the Sharon government, just like the Barak government, has not initiated a plan to do anything about the situation.

"Yes, there are many patrols, and they respond or react to various provocations by the Palestinian Authority, but initiatives to change or reverse the situation have been non-existent," he said.

The closing of the Temple Mount to Jews since Rosh Hashanah, and the turning over of Joseph's Tomb to the PA, "two of the most holy sites in Judaism, has only encouraged the PA to continue doing what they have been doing.

"There is no question," he said, "that the only solution is for the army to go to war against the PA, and that means all-out war throughout the [West Bank and Gaza Strip]."

Local survivor sets up education centre in Croatia

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Due largely to the efforts of a local Holocaust survivor, a Holocaust education centre has now been established in Croatia.

Esther Bem, 70, who was born and raised in Zagreb, says that establishing the centre has been something about which she is "absolutely fanatical; it is one of the biggest achievements of my life."

Until recently, said Bem, Croatia "conveniently forgot to teach [school children] about the Holocaust. High school students were given inaccurate information, and history textbooks were changed in order to accommodate the government's false information."

With a change in government in Croatia, however, Bem said the "opportunity arose to implement Holocaust studies in high schools, and start teaching young people what really took place in their own country."

Bem's sister, who still lives in Zagreb, is president of the executive board at the Jewish Community Centre. "It is a vibrant Jewish community of 13,000 people. They have brought over a rabbi from Israel, and they hold Shabbat services, lectures and Hebrew classes."

Bem said that for several years, she had been exchanging ideas with Zagreb community members about how to establish a Holocaust education program.

"A group of people felt that it was time to act, and they felt a visit from me would be useful, so I ventured on my mission."

She credits Carole Anne Reed, director of education at the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto, UJA FEDERATION, with preparing her for the trip.

"Carole briefed me, and organized all the material that I was supposed to take – almost a suitcase full. She organized it according to topics, such as running seminars, holding a Holocaust Education Week, how to teach the Holocaust to students, resource and reference material and how to organize survivors' testimonies."

Fortunately, she said, a young woman, Hana Fraucetic, volunteered to become director of the centre. "I then set up a committee, all volunteers, who are prominent in different fields of expertise in Zagreb."

After this initial work, said Bem, she met with government officials and explained to them how the Holocaust is being taught in Ontario.

"I told them about the 16,000 students passing through our centre yearly, and how we have survivor speakers [Bem is among them] telling their stories.

"I promised we would help in any way we [could], and also mentioned that it took years to achieve what we did," she said.

At that meeting, said Bem, the deputy minister promised to set aside one day a year to commemorate Yom Hashoah in high schools. The day will be dedicated to lectures, films and teaching of the Holocaust.

"He also promised to present a proposal to his minister to have current textbooks revised, and to send a letter to all high school principals in major cities in Croatia asking them to prepare history teachers for teaching about the Holocaust," said Bem.

"I honestly believe that this effort is a major historical breakthrough, and that with time and patience we will undo the harm done to young minds, and educate the parents and children in a country that was isolated for a decade from the truth."

Funding of the centre is still an issue, said Reed, but they did receive a grant for someone to attend a course in Sweden. "Unless there is proper training, teaching the Holocaust can be dangerous. It is possible to give the wrong information, and [thereby] trivialize it."

Wherever there are survivors, it is important to have a Holocaust centre, said Reed. "It is [especially] important in Croatia because they have yet to learn peace building or how to live with minorities and build a civil society.

"Inherent in Holocaust education are core lessons on the importance of tolerance and human rights," said Reed.

"We've started something that until now has been dead," said Bem. "I plan to attend the September launch in schools. I will not let it go."

Dry Bones
OKAY! WE ADMIT IT! MID-EAST TENSIONS CONTINUE BECAUSE OF US!
THE WHOLE WORLD IS READY FOR "PEACE"...
AND ISRAEL REFUSES TO ALLOW ITSELF TO BE DESTROYED!
IT'S THAT OLD JEWISH ARROGANCE AGAIN.

How is it possible?

How is it possible, in this day and age, most of the world is asking itself, that a vulnerable minority is again being forced by an oppressive majority, to wear "the yellow star of David"? How is it possible, in this day and age, that a government did not ask itself to consider the evil inherent in requiring some of its citizens to wear that sickening, sinister, singling-out "yellow star"?

In defiance of all civilized norms, the Taliban rulers of Afghanistan last week decreed that the estimated 5,000 Hindus in that country must wear a distinctive yellow patch on their clothing whenever they venture outside.

Not only for Jews, but especially for Jews, the image was frightful and disgusting. Around the world people reacted with horror.

Canada has "strongly condemned" the Afghani edict. And we are pleased for that. But every government and every person must strongly condemn this latest barbarity. The secretary-general of the United Nations, Kofi Annan, has expressed dismay over the decree and urged the Afghani government not to implement it. But he should do much more than that. He should immediately convene the Security Council to censure and sanction the Taliban. The "yellow badge" has removed the matter from realm of internal Afghani affairs. It is now a legitimate and appropriate concern for the international community.

If the Taliban rulers were unaware of the implications and associations their decree evoked, their ignorance is cause for worry. On the other hand, if the Taliban rulers were very much aware of those implications and associations, but were indifferent nevertheless, their extremism and ruthlessness are cause for alarm.

Ever since the Taliban ascended to power, Afghanistan has descended by slow, deathly stages into a dark, medieval world of intolerance and fear, where human life is subordinate to intemperate, inflexible ideology. That "the yellow badge" is again possible in this day and age means that in every day and age, people and governments of good will and conscience must be ever vigilant.

Now more than ever

Two weeks ago, a TV commentator referred to the bludgeoning slaughter of the two teenage boys from Tekoa as the "deaths of two settlers." Last week, a TV news show referred to Yom Yerushalayim, saying "Israel celebrates the capture of the Arab part of Jerusalem." The examples are countless.

The result is an increasing hostility among those people with malign motives towards Israel, and an increasing defensiveness among those people with good feelings toward Israel.

We must all act in this situation. As Prof. Gil Troy passionately and eloquently writes in the Perspectives essay in this issue: "All people of good conscience... should rise up and strike down this anti-Zionist venom... We cannot keep on with business as usual. Israel needs our help in fighting this war of headlines and propaganda..."

And that is why the sight of thousands of people marching in support of Israel was so rousing and so deeply inspiring.

The Vatican is culpable

Criticism of the Pope has focused on his silence [in the face of anti-Semitic remarks by Bashar Assad] both during and after his journey his recent visit to Syria.

I believe there is another, equally strong, criticism that can be made. The papal trip to Syria was no doubt planned at length as part of the Pope's overall journey to the area. There would have been a good deal of contact between papal and Syrian officials regarding the visit, its protocol, security measures, and likely, discussion of common and divergent positions regarding actions and statements to be made by each side. The Pope and his advisors know that Syria is a dictatorship with multiple secret police forces that oversee each other and anti-government sentiment in the country. They know that Syria has sponsored terrorism. They know that Bashar Assad is the son of Hafaz Assad who killed all living souls, numbering 10 to 20 thousand, in the city of Ham in 1982. When the papal entourage arrived in Kuneitra on the Golan Heights, a city destroyed in the 1973 Yom Kippur War, they knew, as all international political analysts knew, that Syria would use the occasion to condemn Israel for the destruction of the city, with no mention that Syria, for decades, rained terror upon Israel's northern border [from the Heights].

Altogether, the Vatican stands culpable of its silence in the face of broad anti-Semitic rhetoric, in its silence when this anti-Semitic calumny claimed to incorporate Christian sentiment, and guilty of an uncalled for papal visit to Syria, at a time when it must have surmised, at the very least, the hidden agenda its host would propagate at this "auspicious" occasion.

Lack of respect for humanity

Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat has no comment when asked about the murder by stoning and knifing of two Jewish 14-year-olds, one of whom was an American citizen. Why don't Arab leaders in Canada or the rest of the world condemn such outrageousness? And terrorist organizations that claim responsibility and satisfaction for such acts are welcomed at international conferences in Iran and will be in South Africa where the odious resolution "Zionism equals racism" will again be introduced. Such is the respect for human life and rights in the year 2001.

UN mockery

The institution upon which we depend to ensure that the nations of the world have a forum for rational discussion so that differences can be settled around a table and not on a battlefield has proven to be as great a farce as the League of Nations that preceeded it. It has expelled from the Human Rights Commission the United States, a nation that has one of the best records in the world for pursuing human rights. Even more ironically, it has included in that commission countries with the worst human rights record in history: China, Libya and Sudan. What a mockery that makes of our hopes and dreams!

If we are unable to clearly and truthfully identify our problems, we will be unable to solve them. Expediently brushing tyranny under the carpet will only permit it to fester and mushroom into a bigger problem that we will be forced to tackle at a later date when we can no longer look away.

Israel has strayed

As a Jew in Canada, I am becoming increasingly saddened and dismayed by the blind unqualified support for Israel's current military actions.

If your newspaper is indeed an organ for the entire Canadian Jewish community, why is it that it can't embrace alternative attitudes, opinions and actions of the community? I am not a leftist. I am a humanist, a secular Jew who believes in egalitarianism, pluralism and multiculturalism. I would like to see more alternative viewpoints raised in your paper as a forum for discussion amongst all of us.

It is not self-hating to criticize Israel. If anything, it would be healing to find ways to lure the Israeli mindset away from it 9s current paternalistic militarism.

The old-guard mentality of the world against the Jews needs to be lost. It is this mentality that prevents us from growth in our consciousness as a people. It is this mentality that we and the State of Israel use to justify murder, home demolitions, human rights abuses and economic strangulation. These are not the tenets of Judaism, and by engaging in such activities, Israel has strayed from the righteous path.

Those of us who are angered by Israeli actions have important ideas to share with the community at large. Such progressive ideals need to be published in The Canadian Jewish News in order to broaden the perspective and facilitate true dialogue within our own community. Only then can we move forward to resolving a conflict that will just serve to erode our community as time goes on.

Landry looking for votes

In response to your article on Bernard Landry (The CJN, May 24), if I thought Landry was at any time sincere about his good wishes towards the Jewish people, then I must be out of my mind.

Mr. Landry has always been on the lookout for votes to make, as he says, sovereignty come true. Why all of a sudden does he care about us? Sure, Jews and French Canadians may have something in common, but why all of a sudden do they care now? I say he wants the most votes from the Jews. If I was still a resident of Quebec, I can guarantee that he wouldn't receive a vote from me because I don't believe all his flattery towards the Jewish people.

Why I am an anti-anti-Zionist

By GIL TROY

In honour of Yom Ha'atzmaut this year, I wrote an essay for the Montreal Gazette titled Why I am a Zionist. The article sought to return to basics during this difficult passage in Israel's existence. To our non-Jewish friends, I tried to explain why Zionism, which is Jewish nationalism, is no more racist than any other form of nationalism. And to my fellow Jews, I tried to emphasize the big picture beyond the messy and depressing complexities of 2001.

"A century ago, Zionism revived pride in the label 'Jew,'" I wrote. "Today, Jews must revive pride in the label 'Zionist.'"

Throughout this essay, I was very careful to avoid addressing the Palestinian question at all, beyond ending with a hope that just as in the 20th century Israel made the Jewish dream of restoring a homeland a reality, that in the 21st century, Israel would figure out how to reconcile with the Arab world and make the dream of living in peace with her neighbours a reality.

Nevertheless, some respondents caricatured my essay in subsequent op-eds and in the letters to the editor section as an attack on Palestinians and as a racist piece. These reactions made it very clear: far too many of Israel's enemies see the affirmation of any kind of Zionism as an act of aggression against them.

Even more disturbing were some of the responses the Gazette chose not to publish. One pro-Palestinian organization defines itself as "anti-Zionist, anti-capitalist, anti-racism, anti-U.S. global hegemony, anti-globalization!!" and "pro-Hamas, pro-Taliban, pro-all Islamic resistance movements fighting occupation and oppression. And most of all, pro-Islam." The organization's Web site posted a letter they sent to the Gazette saying, "Why I'm a Zionist reminds me of other possible scenarios. Why I'm a KKK member. To be proud repressing others, feeling superior and a chosen people who deserve to kill, maim and torture... God help us when we can allow people to stand up and say 'Why I'm [a] terrorist, 'Why I kill children,' 'Why I'm a Nazi,' 'Why I agree with state-sponsored terrorism,' 'Why I bulldoze families home.'"

Perhaps most depressing was the letter from a Canadian man who began with the, by now, knee-jerk (if conceptually paradoxical), free association of Zionism with "Bolshevism, Nazism and racism of the worst order." The man equated "the language the Nazis used to describe the Jews in Germany in the 1930s and '40s and the language now being used by the Ashkenazi Jews to describe the natives of Palestine: snakes, subhuman, foreigners living on the land God gave us, etc."

As so many anti-Zionists do, the man then naturally segued into the ugliest forms of anti-Semitism, saying, "I understand why Herr Hitler rose to power and why the Jewish holocaust [sic] – a harsh reaction to the Jewish misdeeds – took place." Calling the "last Jewish holocaust" an "act of 'divine justice,'" he concluded, "You have, without realizing it, given in your article 14 reasons why the next holocaust is bound to occur... Your article tends to support the view that I have heard about as a child that a Jew is born without a soul; he has no sympathy for anyone unless his own interest is involved in it."

These days, you do not need a PhD to recognize that the Middle East is a very confusing place. And I would never do what my critics have done and tar all critics with the same brush. There is a lot of room for honest and critical debate about Israeli policy toward the Palestinians yesterday and today, and not everyone who questions any Israeli action in any realm is necessarily an Israel-hater or an anti-Zionist.

Nevertheless, I wish to thank my critics for imposing a certain conceptual clarity on the conflict. All Jews, all Canadians, all people of good conscience throughout the world, should rise up and strike down this anti-Zionist venom that has seeped into daily political discourse. As the above examples indicate, such new-fangled anti-Zionism is often hard to distinguish from old-fashioned Jew hatred – no matter how many "man-bite-dog" op-ed essays the few but loud anti-Zionist Jews may publish. We have seen anti-Semitism blur into anti-Zionism in the Syrian president's ugly anti-Jewish remarks when greeting the Pope; we have seen anti-Zionism blur into anti-Semitism with the steep rise in attacks on Jews in Canada and throughout the world since September.

This group of Montrealers does what Gil Troy urges. By joining the 'March to Jerusalem' last week, they 'stood up and fought' for Israel. [Howard Kay photo]

It is tragic and ironic that this resurgence of anti-Zionism comes almost a decade after Oslo, when, polls have shown, a majority of Israelis and a majority of Jews throughout the world began to acknowledge Palestinian nationalism. It is tragic and pathetic that these blood libels, new and old, come after former prime minister Ehud Barak offered a sweeping set of concessions at Camp David last summer, almost 97 percent of the territories. It is tragic and demonic that these attacks on the right of Israel to exist are being heard throughout the world and covering up many Palestinians' resort to violence instead of peaceful negotiations.

We in the Jewish community need to focus on these fundamental issues, on the right of Israel to exist, and on many Palestinians' violent repudiation of attempts at peace, even as we struggle with the political, strategic, moral, and existential challenges of today. We must not get so bogged down in apologias and defensiveness that we ignore the bigger picture.

A quarter of a century ago, America's ambassador to the United Nations, Daniel Patrick Moynihan, rejected the infamous UN "Zionism is racism" resolution as "an obscene act." Moynihan later explained that he recognized more than "uninformed bigotry" at play: "It is conscious politics... It is not merely that our adversaries have commenced an effort to destroy the legitimacy of a kindred democracy through the incessant repetition of the Zionist-racist lie. It is that others can come to believe it also."

The poisonous seeds Moynihan saw sown in the mid-1970s are bearing deadly fruit today. We cannot sit by idly and let these libels fester. We must, as Jews, and as proud citizens of a great democracy, stand up and fight. In Montreal for example, 105 Jewish organizations from across the political and religious spectrum have banded together in Project Solidarity to affirm the Jewish community's support for the State of Israel and her people. People are wearing blue and white ribbons to demonstrate their support. Beyond this symbol, the project hopes to raise one hundred thousand dollars – representing one dollar for each Jew in the community – to support trauma facilities Israelis so badly need at this time.

We cannot afford today to be blasé. We cannot keep on with business as usual. Israel needs our help in fighting this war of headlines and propaganda, a war which distorts the truth and feeds real violence in the Middle East. Jews in Montreal should be vying for the honour to contribute to this project and should be raising many times more than the one hundred thousand dollar goal. And Jews throughout Canada should follow this example. Not a wedding should occur, not a bar or bat mitzvah should be celebrated, in which a donation is not made – by both hosts and guests. Not a Jewish organization should meet, nor a Jewish festivity be held, in which some affirmation of solidarity with Israel, pecuniary and otherwise, is not made. The money will be well-spent and the message will come through loud and clear: whatever our differences, whatever our confusions, we reject the anti-Zionist libels, we support the right of Israel to exist, and pray desperately for a real peace – one that satisfies as many people as possible as soon as possible.

A rare anniversary (Part I)

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Some years ago, my wife and I took a Caribbean cruise and paid a brief visit to the island of Curaçao. The island harbours the oldest synagogue in the Western Hemisphere, distinguished by its exquisite architecture and the famous sand floor that was meant to imitate the tabernacle that our people built in the Sinai Desert during their 40-year wanderings.

The islanders have another reason for the sandy floor of the sanctuary. Many of their ancestors were Marranos, secret Jews and refugees from the Spanish and Portuguese Inquisition. In their homes, they secretly observed Jewish prayers and tradition and covered their floors with sand in order to dull the sound of their prayers. True or not, the explanation is fascinating.

The synagogue is some 30 years older than the Touro synagogue, the oldest in the United States. But age alone does not tell the full story.

A week ago, I had the privilege of visiting Curaçao once again, unfortunately this time without my wife. I had accepted a special invitation that took me to Congregation Mikveh Israel-Emanuel, which was observing its 350th anniversary. It was a privilege to be there.

The crown prince, who will become king one day when Queen Wilhelmina resigns or dies, was also a participant in the rededication ceremonies.

Dutch, English and Spanish are the tongues one hears, and in addition, many of the native-born speak Papiamentu, an amalgam of these languages.

There were a number of memorable programs, among them a music festival in the government square, with 1,700 people joining the open-air presentations by Curaçao artists and a large group of chazzanim from North America (with Cantor Benjamin Maissner participating, and Ben Steinberg as director).

Rabbis too, came from all over, most prominent among them Chaim Potok, famed novelist, who filled the city's World Trade Centre to capacity. He gave a fascinating lecture on Jewish migrants.

One of the panels in which I participated dealt with the difficulties that small communities often encounter. Young people are leaving Curaçao increasingly – the attraction of the United States is overwhelming. This was the sad part of the visit, but I feel that the great devotion for their tradition that Curaçaons have will somehow help them survive the present crisis of becoming ever smaller.

The course of history follows its own unpredictable pattern. Strong communities like Germany were wiped out and later on regained a new foothold for the future. Some communities at the edge of extinction were miraculously saved by a sudden reversal of economic and political circumstances. I would like to hope that this will be in store for Curaçao as well.

Altogether it was a memorable occasion, and my next column will report on it further.

An education imperative

Shiva Herzog in Toronto

Two recent international reports point to disturbing trends with potential long-term, negative consequences for Israeli society. The first analyzes the relationship between educational achievements in math and science and poverty; the second deals with violence in Israeli schools.

The number of Israelis living below the poverty line has increased over the last several decades, when measured by income alone without the benefit of state-generated welfare payments. And in 1999, average grades of Israeli students in math and science ranked the country 27th out of 38 countries surveyed internationally by economist Eric Hanushek. Israelis ranked below all other industrial countries, as well as below poorer countries such as Thailand and Romania, where the GDP per capita is one-third lower than Israel's. Moreover, the internal disparities in grades of Israeli students were greater than those of 34 of the 38 countries surveyed.

The most disturbing statistic dealt with the weakest students in the chain. Israel's bottom five percent ranked 31st out of 38, below the weakest students, not only in the United States, but in Malaysia, Taiwan, Iran, Turkey, Tunisia, Cyprus and many other countries. The Israeli finding is especially serious because the sample did not include children in the haredi system, where proficiency in these subjects is even weaker than in the rest of the population.

While Israel spends relatively large amounts of money on education, the income gap between the haves and have-nots has grown considerably. Hanushek's thesis is that while investment in education generally is the best catalyst for economic growth, specific investment in math and science education is directly linked to higher income. In 1963-64, Israeli students' results in math and science were the highest among 12 industrial countries surveyed, in spite of the country's economic challenges at the time.

The standard of education in these subjects has clearly dropped. In the 1999 survey, in a comparison of the grades of the top five percent of Israeli students with those of other countries, the Israelis ranked 23rd out of 38. In most societies, it is from this five percent that the professors, CEOs and policy makers come. If today Israel's universities and high-tech companies are staffed with graduates of the education system of the '60s and '70s, tomorrow's faculty and managers will be the students in the latest survey.

As part of its research, the International Association for Equalization of Educational Achievements also surveyed violence in schools. Here, too, the results are disturbing. Israelis schools ranked highest in the degree of physical violence to which students are exposed. Twenty-five percent of Israeli eighth grade students have been physically assaulted by fellow students while in school. Israel ranked second in the survey in the extent of vandalism, second only to the Netherlands.

While the chief scientist of the Ministry of Education responded with concern to these findings, the report of the 1999 Vilnay Committee on Violence in Schools has not been implemented, or even disseminated widely through the school system. At the time, committee chair Matan Vilnay, former deputy chief of staff and a cabinet minister, called for significant changes in the administration of public education. These included smaller classes and hundreds of additional psychologists and guidance counsellors. The cost of these and other recommendations was so huge as to render the report virtually irrelevant.

This difficult reality exists against the backdrop of a high dropout rate from Israeli high schools among Arab and immigrant students (within five years of their arrival in Israel). More than 20 percent of students from these population groups drop out of school by age 17. The 15 percent average school dropout rate places Israel in a weaker position than France, Sweden and Japan, but in a stronger position than the United States and Italy.

This plethora of statistics represents far more than numbers. Israel's economic boom, especially in the high-tech sector, was the result of the success of an elite group of young people, most of whom served in elite military units. But as in other Western countries, the public school system is sorely in need of change, not just in the area of scholastic achievement, but in values and norms of conduct as well. Inertia will have significant ramifications that are no less important than security issues as building blocks for a successful future

The challenge of defending Israel

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

In mid-May, I found myself seated around a large table in Montreal's City Hall. The occasion was a presentation by a four-person panel – I was one of the panellists – to inform those present about Jews in general and Montreal Jews in particular. The audience was made up of members of a volunteer committee dealing with and representative of Montreal's cultural diversity, and several city officials, including Mayor Bourque.

During my remarks, I outlined several dimensions of Jewish identity. One of these, I argued, was support for human rights and liberal democracy in Canada and elsewhere in the Diaspora.

After the four brief presentations, the session was open for questions. One questioner, with absolutely no malice but with a spirit of friendly curiosity, asked me to explain how I reconcile this support for progressive positions and human rights by Diaspora Jews with the fact that Israel has for so long repressed basic rights of Palestinians and Israeli Arabs. As I heard the question unfold, I began to wrestle with the dilemma of how I ought to respond.

What concerned me was the form in which I would package my answer, the atmospherics and context I would set. One approach would have been the more polite and politically correct response. I could accept the premise of the question, that from its inception and certainly since 1967, the Israeli State has violated basic rights as a matter of course.

The other approach, which I chose, was to reject the basic assumption of the question. Given the audience around the table, as well as the context of the media pounding which Israel has experienced since the renewed intifadah, I took a tougher pro-Israel line than I might have in other circumstances. Indeed, the question was not focused on the violence of recent months, but on a generic pattern common throughout Israel's history.

I made the conventional – and accurate – arguments about Israel being the only democracy in the Middle East. Both Israeli Arabs and Palestinians recognize that the Israeli court system has been fairer and the media more open than those in neighbouring Arab countries or in Arafat's Palestinian Authority.

I suggested that the more interesting question was to explain why, in the face of fifty years of Arab hostility, of wars and terror, Israel's treatment of Palestinians and Israeli Arabs was not more severe, and why Israel's Arab minority has not been engaged in far more acts of terror over the last fifty years against Jewish/Israeli targets.

I wondered how Canada might fare when pushed to extremes. Imagine if the First Nations in Canada comprised 15 percent of the Canadian population and that Canada was surrounded by a dozen First Nation countries who had, since 1867, fought wars denying Canada's right to exist and routinely sent for or encouraged terrorists to murder innocent Canadians.

The provocations which led to the Japanese internment during World War II, or the War Measures Act of 1970, were serious but far less dangerous. All democracies, be they England fighting the IRA, France fighting the Algerians or Americans fighting the Vietnamese, will violate democratic principles during war or when facing real or perceived threats. In Israel's case, for five decades, the threat has been real.

Israel is far from a perfect state. Prejudice and discrimination against its Arab minority are common. Palestinians in the territories are brutalized. The Law of Return violates basic principles of civic equality – but this is true of immigration and citizenship laws in many European countries, as well as in Japan.

I admit that arguing that Israel's record is comparable to that of other liberal democracies, and far better than that of Arab states, is not the best defence. We can and do hold Israel to a higher standard. In other settings, I am wont to do just that. But sitting around this table, I just did not feel in the mood to be too defensive. Apologetics can be used by the enemies of Israel to undermine the very legitimacy of the State. In the face of its many challenges, Israel remains a model of democracy and the rule of law.

The Kirshner File

Weider developed and shaped an industry

Ben Weider practises what he preaches. He exercises regularly, keeps himself rigorously in shape, and downs a cocktail of 30 tablets packed with nutrients, proteins and minerals every day.

"I am 77 years young," he proclaims, proud as a peacock.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

In physical fitness and bodybuilding circles, as well as in the sports nutrition industry, Ben Weider and his brother, Joe, 80, are icons and gurus.

It is probably fair to say, without exaggerating the point, that the Montreal brothers pioneered the still growing fitness and strength-conditioning industry. "We actually created the physical fitness movement around the world," Ben Weider claimed in a recent interview.

The Weiders – the sons of working-class Polish immigrants – were the founders of the Weider Sports Equipment Company Limited. When they sold it five years ago, its best-selling products were treadmills and home gym equipment.

"When we started, there was practically no sale of this type of equipment, nor of sports nutrition products," Weider said.

The business they developed decades ago, almost single-handedly, is now a multi-billion dollar industry.

Today, through Weider Health and Fitness Corp., the Weiders focus on producing sports nutrition supplements, which they distribute in more than 100 countries. "Athletes can use them instead of drugs and obtain wonderful results," he said.

Weider is also president of the International Federation of Bodybuilders (IFBB), an outfit he founded in 1946.

The IFBB, with branches in 172 countries, was granted official recognition by the International Olympic Commitee in 1998. He considers the IFBB as perhaps his most important accomplishment. Thanks to the IFBB, bodybuilding is a sport in the Pan American Games, the Southeast Asia Games, the Asia Games, the South American Games, the Central American Games, the Caribbean Games, the Arab Games, the World Games, the South Pacific Games and the African Games.

The brothers are also magazine publishers, churning out a medley of monthlies with a combined circulation of almost four million: Men's Fitness, Shape, Muscle & Fitness, Flex, Shape Fit Pregnancy, Natural Health and Muscle & Fitness.

With a Grade 7 education and $6 as starting capital, Joe founded the Weider empire in 1940. He began by publishing Your Physique, a mimeographed fitness magazine sold mainly in Montreal. Weider, a school dropout too, joined the budding firm in 1945. "We dropped out of school because we needed to contribute money to our family," he explained. Their parents, Louis and Anna, settled in Canada in 1919.

Louis, a presser in a garment factory, sired sports-minded sons. Joe was a wrestler, champion weightlifter and bodybuilder. Ben, a boxer, was a Golden Gloves semi-finalist.

"When we started the business, we had no particular plan," he recalled. "Money was not our objective. We believed in bodybuilding and wanted to make it a popular activity, not only in Canada but around the world."

They were ridiculed when they suggested that bodybuilding and the use of proteins, vitamins and minerals was integral to athletic performance and good health. "We let them laugh and stayed on course," said Weider, the recipient of the Order of Canada in 1975.

"We believed in our vision, and through hard work and determination, we succeeded in making our dream come true," added Weider, co-chef de mission of Canada's Maccabiah Games squad. "Fitness is now a lifestyle."

The Weiders run their company in true team fashion. Weider is the administrator and international marketing director. "Joe is the creative genius behind the magazines, and is a marketing genius," said Weider.

Ben's 38-year-old son, Eric, a graduate of Western and the University of Toronto, is president of the corporation and all its holding companies. He lives in California. (His two other sons, Mark and Louis, are in photography and antiques, respectively.)

The Middle East is a lucrative market for the Weiders, bodybuilding being popular in the Arab world and gradually growing in popularity in Israel.

Weider, in the past number of years, has donated gyms to the Knesset, the city of Jerusalem and the Syrian, Jordanian and Lebanese Olympic Committees.

In addition, the autonomous Palestinian towns of Ramallah and Gaza have been the recipients of Weider gyms.

They were not given to the Palestinian Authority per se, but to Palestinian youths who wish to become athletes. "That was my major motivation," Weider said.

Weider visited Gaza last September, before the outbreak of the current intifadah, and his scheduled five minute audience with Yasser Arafat, the PA president, stretched into a 35 minute meeting. Arafat was not in the best of health. "He was suffering from Parkinson's disease, and it showed."

Joe, Eric and Ben Weider.

Subsequently, Arafat wrote him an effusive letter, thanking Weider "for your faithful and constructive efforts that you are exerting on all levels to support our Palestinian people in sport and physical fields."

Weider is actually an old Middle East hand, having initially visited the region in 1947 as guest of a famous Egyptian weightlifter and sports administrator in Cairo.

Since then, he has been through virtually every Middle Eastern capital, including Baghdad and Damascus.

"I have always been received with respect, consideration and great warmth," he said of his Arab hosts. "Everybody knew that I am of Jewish origin and that we have donated gyms to Israel, but nobody ever objected. It is amazing, but not one of my Arab colleagues or friends reacted negatively to my Jewish faith."

In 1972, when Weider went to Iraq as the president of the IFBB, the University of Baghdad presented him with an honourary degree in physical education.

"The highlight of the trip was a visit to Babylon and Ur, since I am interested in history and archeology," said Weider, the president of the International Napoleonic Society, with chapters in 30 nations.

He has not been back to Iraq since. "I would travel to Iraq today only if I was invited by the Iraqi Olympic Committee or by the Iraqi Bodybuilding Federation," said Weider, who was accompanied by four security agents during his first and only trip there.

Like Shimon Peres, Israel's foreign minister, Weider thinks that business and politics do mix.

"I absolutely believe that business can indeed build bridges between Jews and Arabs in the Middle East," said Weider, whom the National Jewish Fund will honour at a dinner in Montreal on June 4. "Arabs are natural business people and they would make ideal business partners with Jews. There are numerous Arabs in business with Jews and they are highly successful."

Being an incurable optimist, he is sanguine about the chances of a lasting peace in the Middle East. "It is in the interests of both peoples," observed Weider, honourary president of the Arab Physical Culture Federation. "The Middle East is a fabulously wealthy area. Most Arab countries have a tremendous amount of raw materials and potential. When peace comes, the Middle East could indeed be, as the Bible states, a land of milk and honey."

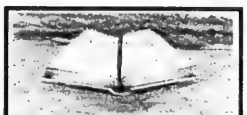
We can set healthy boundaries

By RABBI DAVEEN LITWIN

Stress, burn-out and anxiety are all words we may hear or use in conversations on a daily basis. Taking on additional spiritual or physical commitments may not seem to be a useful way to ease our sense of exhaustion.

There is, however, a role model in this week's Torah portion for creating guidelines to a healthier and holier life, something which is potentially accessible and attainable for each of us.



Rabbinic Reflections

Parshat Naso contains the laws of the Nazirite, an individual who commits him or herself to taking "time out" from the pressures of everyday life.

Specifically, the Nazirite vows not to cut his or her hair, consume any grape products or have any contact with a dead body. Nazirites could be of any age or gender; according to the Mishnah, many Israelite women took upon themselves Nazirite vows.

In general, Judaism frowns upon ascetism or any actions that separate an individual from the community, and yet the Torah clearly does permit Nazirites to "separate from the ways of the common people" (Rashi) for defined periods of time. In some rare cases, like Samson, a parent may make this a lifetime choice for their child. Nonetheless, even when a person takes on the Nazirite vows, they were still fully integrated into society, allowed to marry, conduct business and observe all the commandments.

The Torah explains the laws related to becoming a Nazirite but does not tell us why someone would choose to do so. Some commentators suggest that individuals chose to devote themselves to this "holy" lifestyle for a certain period of time after recuperation from illness, as repentance for past behaviour, as an active prayer for a hope or wish for the future or in gratitude to God. Bachya ibn Pakuda regards the self-disciplined vows of the Nazirite as a positive example of leading a life of moderation and of a healthy well-being.

What strikes me is that it is clearly the choice of the individual to become a Nazirite – to voluntarily accept the terms and responsibilities that help one to achieve a higher level of kedushah or holiness. Could we make similar choices today? The vows of the Nazirite still seem relevant in modernity.

Similar to the Nazirite, might we not find a renewed sense of balance and holiness in our lives if we could designate a "time out" to be freed from worrying about our physical appearance, to have our minds cleared from the influence of alcohol or other substances, to focus on life and living rather than the constant physical or emotional challenges of death?

These are not simple commitments nor are they things we can always control.

Nonetheless, the Torah suggests there are healthy boundaries we can set which are potentially within our grasp. Perhaps the Nazirite offers us a contemporary role model for making time to rejuvenate the mind, body and spirit. Like our ancestors, we can choose sacred ways to find healing and wholeness by a commitment to and participation in Jewish ritual and tradition.

Educational organization aims to teach the spiritual side of Judaism

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Being Jewish means restoring one's soul, asserts Rabbi David Aron.

Rabbi Aron is the founder of Isralight, an educational organization in Israel and the United States that aims to teach the spiritual side of Judaism.

He was in Toronto recently as part of a North American book tour for his latest publication, Ten Life Changing Lessons of Kabbalah.

The book deals with eternal questions about the nature of God. "I want to show how knowing God makes life sensual, pleasurable, meaningful and loving," he said.

It is this spiritual and emotional approach that the rabbi feels is often hidden in Jewish practice. As a child, he said, he had associated Judaism "with pain, suffering and guilt. I saw my bar mitzvah as the day I would be free."

At 18, he became involved with the National Conference of Synagogue Youth, and his attitude changed. "I was shocked to see people wearing a T-shirt with rock and roll slogans, and their tzitzit hanging out of Levi jeans. They were hip and funny – happy to be Jewish."

When he discovered that his intellectual questioning was taken seriously, he came back regularly. Eventually, he went to yeshiva, intending to study there for a year. Instead, "every year was so exciting that I decided to stay longer and longer, and eventually got smichah, rabbinic ordination."

Rabbi Aron is not an advocate of blind faith. "Doubt is healthy," he said. "If there is no doubt, then I don't think that faith can be alive and fresh.

"Faith is like courage," he went on. "Courage is knowing that there is danger, but going out to battle anyway. True faith is having doubts, but overcoming them."

> 'There is a vacuum in Jewish spirituality'

Nevertheless, one thing that he has no doubts about is the existence of God. "I am as certain that there is a God and that His teachings are real as I am sure that love is real, even if I can't prove it."

While there has been much growth in the study of Talmud and Jewish law in recent years, he said, "there is a vacuum in Jewish spirituality, mysticism, and philosophy – issues which are relevant and challenging for the modern Jew."

Regular yeshivot, he said, teach "skills, talmudic dialectic and how to make halachic decisions. I have great respect for that – but how many people truly understand the purpose and the meaning of prayer, who God is, and the beauty of the Shchinah, His presence."

The vacuum is not just in the study of these matters, but in finding inspiring educators who can teach them, he said. Sixteen years ago, Rabbi Aron decided to create his own institution in Israel, Isralight, both to teach and to develop new teachers.

Isralight sponsors three- and five-day retreats in Hope, N.J. One is over Labour Day weekend, what the rabbi describes as "the ultimate vacation for the mind, the body and the soul." It will feature gourmet vegetarian food, sports, yoga, meditation and learning.

Similar retreats in Israel include Tour and Explore, where participants see the sites and gain spiritual insights about them, and Inward Bound, a program of intensive Jewish learning.

As well, the organization creates educational material, such as books, tapes and videos. There are also study groups and weekly coffee groups, where "the unaffiliated and those with yeshiva backgrounds all sit together."

Rabbi Aron said he hopes to expand his efforts in North America.

For more information about Isralight, call toll free 1-800-694-4949, 561-447-0592, or go to the Web site, www.isralight.org.

War restitution claims – Pt. 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Franz Maechler. Rifka Aaronsohn. Albert Einstein.

Just three of the thousands of names on the list of Swiss bank account holders who were probably victims of Nazi persecution [www.dormantaccounts.ch/lists.html]. The restitution of the assets of Holocaust victims and the related controversy have received a great deal of coverage in the world media. Since the original Swiss claims process was established in 1997, there have been a number of lawsuits arising out of the Holocaust. Many of these lawsuits have resulted in settlements or agreements, each with its own rules and claims procedures. There are many sites on the Internet where you can learn more about the process, download relevant documents and read about the controversy over restitution.

Please note that there are different claims processes, depending on the type of restitution you are claiming (such as for victims of slave labour, for people trying to retrieve deposited assets, for people who are heirs to old Swiss insurance policies, etc.) Each type of claim requires completion of a detailed form. Volunteer organizations from local Jewish federations and social service agencies worldwide are available to assist claimants with all the paperwork [www.dormantaccounts.ch/volunteer.html]. Claimants may also want to get professional assistance. Please note that the deadline for submitting a claim in some categories is as early as Aug. 5, this year.

One of the best articles to summarize the struggle for Jewish reparations following World War II is also one of the most controversial [www.commentary.org/0009/schoenfeld.html]. Gabriel Schoenfeld, senior editor of Commentary, first takes a look at the history of reparations and the early debates. (In the 1950s Menachem Begin, leader of Israel's Herut party, held street demonstrations to denounce the Israeli government for accepting German "blood money.") Schoenfeld then looks at more recent events and suggests that in addition to "stoking the fires of anti-Semitism on the right," at least some of the claims have been settled under duress by banks or corporations anxious to avoid unceasing notoriety. Schoenfeld's article drew a great deal of response, which Commentary published earlier this year, including a letter from U.S. Deputy Secretary of the Treasury Stuart Eizenstat [www.commentary.org/0101/schoenfeld.html].

In February of this year, the Swiss Bank Dormant Accounts Web Site listed the names of owners 21,000 dormant accounts likely to have belonged to Holocaust victims [www.dormantaccounts.ch/]. In addition to the list of names, the site includes a question and answer section about the claim process, recent press releases and a copy of the detailed claim form. For an explanation of the claim process, consult the Frequently Asked Questions section of the Swiss Bank Claims Web site [www.swissbankclaims.com/Questionsandanswers.asp]. Information at this site is available in 16 languages.

In 1997, the PBS documentary Nazi Gold examined Switzerland's wartime role as banker and financial broker for Nazi Germany. Although the Nazi Gold Web site has not been updated recently, it contains a great deal of valuable information [www.pbs.org/wgbh/pages/frontline/shows/nazis/]. There is a discussion area, a postwar chronology of events, and a transcript of a debate from a Swiss television program, Switzerland & the War: Neutral or Cowardly?

Beyond the official sites, the single best Web site on this topic is run by Swiss journalist Bruno Giussani. Switzerland & the Holocaust Assets is "a one-stop resource page for the information available on the Internet related to the actions of Switzerland and other countries during and after Second World War – more specifically to the handling and recovering of the Holocaust Assets – and its current coverage by the world media." [www.giussani.com/holocaust-assets/]. You'll find references to late-breaking news, a time-line of events and a comprehensive list of relevant Web sites [www.giussani.com/holocaust-assets/websites/websites.html].

Next week, a look at restitution programs from other countries, initiatives to retrieve stolen art and examples of postwar altruism and kindness.

At the heart of the matter

BY RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Included in the Torah readings of the next few weeks is the passage that outlines the Nazarite vow. This vow pertains to men or women who have taken upon themselves a legal commitment to devote themselves to God for a set period of time.

During this time they are not allowed to drink wine or participate in mourning rituals, and they must abstain from cutting their hair. Once the vow of becoming a Nazarite has been taken, it bears the status of any other legal vow and it is a sin to break it.

The most famous Nazarite in the Hebrew Bible is Samson. The story appears in the book of Judges and it is a heartbreaking rendition of a man who cannot find his place among his own people. Jewish children learn of his unique strength and the secret to his power that lay in his hair.

Being a Nazarite, Samson was forbidden to cut his hair, symbolizing his commitment to God. Only when betrayed by the woman he loved, Delilah, was his secret revealed and his hair cut. But his sad tale does not begin with this betrayal.

Samson, although recognized by the text as a judge in Israel, is never recognized by the Jews of his time as a judge. In fact, on one occasion, the tribe of Judah binds Samson and hands him over to the Philistines. He continuously seeks the companionship of foreign women and never builds a home in Israel. In his final moments, captured and blinded by the Philistines, paraded in their great temple and humiliated by them, Samson begs God to let him die with the Philistines. He has lived his life behind enemy lines and perhaps he understands that he can never return home.

The last picture we have of Samson is when his family goes to claim his body and buries him quietly in the family tomb. He is never mourned by his people and he is never praised by them as a great warrior. He is the unsung hero.

Samson, a Nazarite, truly embodied the dangers inherent in such a life. The Nazarite vow portrays an individual who has chosen to withdraw from the community.

Not participating in the joys of wine, leaving their hair unkempt and not involving themselves in the grief of the community will certainly set the Nazarites apart. In fact, upon completion of their vow these people must bring a sin offering to atone for having abstained from both joy and community. One would think that religion would promote a lifestyle that dedicates the individual to God alone, but Judaism does not support such a choice.

Samson's case was unusual. Designated by God as a Nazarite before he was born, he had no choice in the matter. Perhaps God knew that what was needed at that time was a leader who would function behind enemy lines. Such a leader would have to disassociate from his own community in order to bond with the enemy.

Samson accepted his fate and always remained loyal to his people, even when they rejected him. He did not live as the typical Israelite of his time and yet he never once questioned where his heart belonged. His actions may not have been those of a righteous man but his core was unquestionable.

Samson embodies all those heroes among us who go unrecognized and never hear the praise or gratitude they so richly deserve. A passage in the Talmud glimpses this sad truth: The world is sustained by the merit of tzaddikim, but the tzaddikim are not sustained by their own merit.

Anne Frank's legacy continues

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Ironically, Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel provided the inspiration for the recently released novel, Anne Frank and Me.

On March 20, 1994, Cherie Bennett and Jeff Gottesfeld saw Zundel on 60 Minutes and were astonished at how easily teens could be deceived by Holocaust denial.

In response to their feelings, Bennett and Gottesfeld initially wrote a play, also titled Anne Frank and Me, which premiered in April, 1995. Eighteen months later, it was running off-Broadway.

In an interview, Gottesfeld said that one of the major differences between the play and the novel is that the novel addresses the problem of Holocaust denial on the Internet, an issue that barely existed in 1994.

In the novel, the main character, Nicole Burns, is assigned to write a book report on The Diary of Anne Frank for her English class. Nicole, who isn't Jewish, is too consumed by her day-to-day, high-school dilemmas to think deeply about issues that are not personally relevant. So, she turns to the Internet for help.

As Holocaust deniers slowly begin to influence Nicole, a twist of events at a Holocaust museum transplants her back to World War II France and into the Jewish body of Nicole Bernhard.

Although the novel may seem somewhat contrived to adults, the page-turner raises issues which teens can relate to easily – boyfriends, girlfriends, appearances, independence.

As the novel progresses, these issues become secondary as Nicole is forced to cope with war-time realities.

The effectiveness of the novel lies in its ability to explore Nicole Burns' ability to come to terms with her new life as Nicole Bernhard, an assimilated Parisian Jewish girl, and at the same time grope for answers to her new anti-Semitic reality.

Before the yellow star became a part of her life, Nicole Bernhard's world seemed complete – nice clothes, best friends, a sense of belonging and a boyfriend. The twenty-first century self-absorbed Nicole Burns can completely relate to the Nicole that lived 60 years before her.

It is that common understanding which makes these kinds of novels so compelling. Nicole can speak about the complexities and horrors of those times with the universal voice of youth.

Just as Anne Frank did, Nicole struggles with issues of friendship, betrayal, hope and dismay as her family attempts to survive.

Buddy Elias, Anne's last living relative, noted that the novel "is interesting, exciting and true to the facts ... its dedication to Anne warms my heart."

In Anne Frank and Me, the character of Anne is once more brought into question – did she believe in spite of everything that people are good at heart? Or had she given up hope on humanity?

Towards the end of the novel, Nicole meets Anne on a train bound for Auschwitz-Birkenau and they talk.

Anne supports Nicole, offering her friendship and hope on the transport to Auschwitz. Later, on the arrival platform at Birkenau, Nicole extends some hope of her own to a frightened Anne.

For most young readers, it doesn't matter whether Anne believed in humanity or not. What they do relate to, however, are these kinds of encounters.

As Gottesfeld said – "It's just what teens do."

Fair Funding for Education: Myth vs. Reality

UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto and Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region have prepared this supplement – the first in a series – to keep our community informed about the recent provincial tuition tax credit for independent schools.

Myth: No other provinces or countries fund independent religious schools.
Reality: British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Québec all publicly fund independent faith-based schools. The Atlantic provinces do not fund any religious-based schools, but do provide grants for textbooks and other educational material. Some 65 countries around the world recognize the right of parents to send their children to religious-based schools that are publicly funded.

On May 9th, the Ontario government introduced a refundable tax credit for parents of children attending independent schools.

When fully implemented in 2006, this credit will amount to half of the first $7,000 per child in tuition.

"Providing tax credits for parents of children in independent schools is the correct policy choice. There has been systemic state discrimination in Ontario concerning the funding of religious schools with Roman Catholic schools receiving funding and schools of other religious denominations receiving none. Both the government and the official opposition have been stressing the importance of choice in educational matters. Surely, choice needs to be for all and not for some."

— DR. SEYMOUR EPSTEIN, Executive Director, UJA FEDERATION Board of Jewish Education

Myth: Funding of independent schools hurts the public school system.
Reality: There is no evidence that the funding of independent schools in British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba or Québec has harmed the public school system in these jurisdictions. The cost to the provincial government of a 50% tax rebate to parents of children in independent schools is only about one-half of one percent of the total provincial budget.

Myth: Funding of independent religious schools only rewards the rich.
Reality: Most families with children in independent religious schools are middle or lower income. Despite their modest incomes, they pay thousands of dollars and endure tremendous financial sacrifices each year in order to educate their children in their religious traditions, on top of their education taxes. The tax credit eases, but certainly does not eliminate, the financial pressure placed upon parents whose religious needs cannot be accommodated in the public school system.

Myth: Multiculturalism is best served by integrating children of all faiths in public schools.
Reality: Multiculturalism is best served when children are taught tolerance and respect for others. These are principles that must be and are taught in all school systems. While integrating children into a single school system exposes children to the diversity of people in their community, it in no way ensures that they will grow up to be tolerant adults. In addition, a second element of multiculturalism is appreciation for, and the freedom to live, in one's own heritage. Independent schools help to preserve this element by enabling parents to educate their children in their own religious or ethnic traditions.

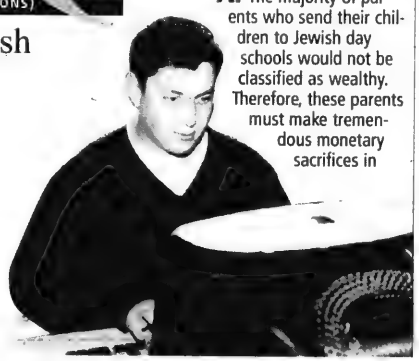
Myth: Provincial tax credits will lead to a mass exodus from public schools to Jewish day schools.
Reality: British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Québec all provide public funds of roughly the same amount proposed by the Ontario government to their independent schools, and nowhere in these jurisdictions is there any evidence that this funding has caused a mass exodus from the public school system. To the contrary, the public schools in these provinces remain strong and vibrant.

FAQs

(FREQUENTLY ASKED QUESTIONS)

about the Jewish Day School System in Ontario

CANADIAN JEWISH CONGRESS
ONTARIO REGION



Q: What sacrifices do parents make in order to send their children to Jewish day schools?

A: The majority of parents who send their children to Jewish day schools would not be classified as wealthy. Therefore, these parents must make tremendous monetary sacrifices in order to educate their children in the Jewish tradition.

Q: How much does it cost to send a child to Jewish day school?

A: Tuition for most Jewish day schools ranges between $6,000 and $13,000 per year per child.

Q: What stream of Judaism do the day schools accommodate?

A: Students from all streams of Judaism attend a wide range of Jewish day schools.

Q: How many students are there in the Ontario Jewish educational system?

A: There are approximately 11,300 students in 34 Jewish day schools (from Junior Kindergarten to OAC) in the GTA. Jewish day school enrollment in the GTA is among the highest per capita in North America. There are approximately 10 schools in Hamilton, Ottawa and London, with roughly 1,000 additional students.

Q: Do families with children in Jewish day schools receive tuition subsidies?

A: At least one-third of all students receive assistance.
UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto currently spends $9 million per year on Jewish education in Toronto with $7 million going toward tuition subsidies each year.

Torah study project aims to foster unity

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — This Shavuot marked the official start of Toronto's Siyum HaTorah project, a North American effort to foster community unity through Torah study.

The idea, explained local organizers Ralph Levine and Rabbi Avraham Bartfeld, is for members of the community to collectively study the entire body of Tanach, the Hebrew Bible, and Talmud over a one year period. Around Shavuot 2002, and every year afterwards, there will be a siyum, a celebration to mark the completion of the first year's project and the beginning of the next.

Those interested can sign up to study anything from a verse, to a chapter, to a book of the Bible, to a volume of Talmud. A computer will keep track of who is doing what, to make sure that everything is being covered.

More than one person can study the same thing, Rabbi Bartfeld said. As well, people can study on their own, with a partner, or in a class.

"It is an opportunity for people with all levels of knowledge to take part in a community Torah study," Levine said.

Siyum HaTorah, the formal name of which is Mifal Zichron Yerachmiel Boruch, originated over 15 years ago in Baltimore, with Rabbi Yerachmiel Boruch Friedman, president of Agudas Yisroel of Baltimore. It is being supported by his son, Howard, who provides financial assistance to any community undertaking the project.

The project is now being run in Queens and Monsey in New York, Seattle, Wash., and Lakewood, N.J. There are plans to expand into more communities.

Rabbi Bartfeld said that he envisions "5,000 Jews taking part – a five year old and a hundred-year-old, Jews in payos, in kippot srugot [the knitted kippot of the religious Zionists], and Lubavitchers."

While Siyum HaTorah is under Orthodox auspices, all Jews are welcome to take part.

As the project spreads through the community, Levine and Rabbi Bartfeld said they hope it will lead to more respect for each other, and less politics and sinat chinum, senseless hatred, between Toronto's Jews.

"The bottom line is that we are all klal yisroel," said Levine.

Continuity in leadership, revenue said essential for future of Jews

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

TORONTO — Continuity in leadership and revenue flow is essential for the future of the Jewish community, said Michael Schulman, chair of the Family Philanthropy Forum.

Toronto's leading charitable families attended the forum recently to hear guest lecturer and nationally renowned philanthropist Lee Meyerhoff Hendler speak on intergenerational philanthropy.

A UJA FEDERATION initiative, operating under the auspices of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, the forum is devoted to educating those families about the most effective and forward thinking philanthropic practices.

"Philanthropy is the art and science of giving money away," said Meyerhoff Hendler.

"The talents and wealth we have are a burden when we don't know what to do with it, but we have the opportunity to do philanthropy, and convey our values and passions to our children and grandchildren."

She said philanthropy is difficult because it is a way to make sense of being Jewish.

"You have to decide how to spend your money in a way that conveys Jewish values, identity and meaning to your kids and grandkids."

Meyerhoff Hendler told the crowd to find a cause or organization they are passionate about, and then invest in it for the long haul.

"When you have a vision of what you want to do and then get your children involved, you have the chance to teach them the value of philanthropy. You can transform your money into a source of honour, and create a legacy for your family," said Meyerhoff Hendler.

Meyerhoff Hendler is a third-generation philanthropist and lectures on Jewish identity, intergenerational philanthropy and issues of women's leadership. She is the author of The Year Mom Got Religion, an autobiographical chronicle of Jewish adult education.

Ontario Liberals pay tribute to Monte Kwinter

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Buoyed by polls showing them ahead of the Conservatives, provincial Liberals showed their fighting trim last week with a gala tribute to Monte Kwinter.

The York Centre MPP was the honoree at the first tribute dinner to benefit the recently-created Ontario Liberal Fund. A series of planned dinners and events is intended to wipe out the party's $3.2 million debt. The dinner was expected to raise over $100,000.

A who's who of provincial and federal Liberals mingled with members of the Jewish and business communities to pay tribute to Kwinter, the popular MPP first elected in 1985 in the old riding of Wilson Heights.

Also in attendance were former federal cabinet minister Robert Kaplan and Greg Sorbara, president of the Ontario Liberal Party, and who's running for a seat in the riding of Vaughan-King-Aurora, left vacant when MPP Al Palladini died earlier this year.

Organizers passed out campaign buttons proclaiming "Kwinter 2003," and the MPP used the occasion to announce he'll seek re-election in the next vote. "Let there be no doubt," he said to applause, "I will be running in the next election."

Israeli consul general Meir Romem brought greetings, and praised Kwinter's work in the '80s on behalf of Soviet Jewry. "He's a mensch," Romem said, "and a great friend of Israel."

The invocation was delivered by Rabbi Edward Goldfarb of Holy Blossom Temple.

Congratulatory messages were read from Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and federal cabinet ministers Elinor Caplan, John Manley and Alan Rock.

Speaker after speaker lauded Kwinter's record and abilities.

"We have an expression in caucus for someone who does 17 things at the same time, and all well," quipped McGuinty. "We call that 'the full Monte.'"

The Liberal leader, introduced by Peterson as "Ontario's premier-in-waiting," recalled Kwinter's "eloquent and powerful" speech before the legislature on Yom Hashoah, proclaimed by the Tory government a few years ago as Holocaust Memorial Day.

"Everyone stopped what they were doing and listened to Monte. It was very moving."

McGuinty conceded he and Kwinter "don't always agree on each on every issue," referring, perhaps, to their recent split on the government's tax credit for private schools. McGuinty has fiercely opposed the measure, and Kwinter supports it

Kwinter, with his wife of 45 years, Wilma, in attendance, issued a passionate defence of politics, saying the field offers an unmatched way to effect change.

Kwinter held three cabinet posts under Peterson, and logged a long list of civic involvement before entering politics, including with the Toronto Harbour Commission, the Canadian National Exhibition and the Indy 500.

CHAT RICHMOND HILL: Faculty, administration, parents and students of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto gathered to celebrate the completion of their first year at the Richmond Hill campus. Paul Shaviv, headmaster of CHAT, said that after last year's initial animated meetings with parents, everyone very quickly pulled together and the school has since been blessed with incredible support. Gary Levine, Richmond Hill vice-principal, said the school has proven that CHAT is where CHAT students are. USDS teacher wins computer education award

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Merav Anafi from the United Synagogue Day School recently won the ECOO Teacher of the Year Award.

Formed in 1979, the Educational Computing Organization of Ontario (ECOO) represents all levels of the education system and draws members from all areas of study.

Anafi was chosen for demonstrating exceptional and imaginative applications in computers, said Pat Bland, the awards chair.

In addition to creating customized activities that conform specifically to ministry guidelines, Anafi's achievements include the manipulation of computer programs, such as Kidpix and HyperStudio, to display Hebrew letters.

With the help of Sam Weisbrod, a Grade 7 student, Anafi changed Kidpix stamps so that the entire Hebrew alphabet would be represented.

The exciting thing about this innovation is that it can be used for many different languages, Anafi said.

At USDS, adding Hebrew to the multi-media program allowed Anafi to integrate computers into the Hebrew and Judaic studies curriculum.

From senior kindergarten on, students use multi-media programs as part of their studies.

Each year, grade-appropriate projects are provided in almost every subject taught. The finished products include slides, which the students arrange, and a narrative, which the students record.

In the five years that Anafi has been with USDS, she has created many customized activities that reflect and build on class themes.

From math and science to spelling and language construction, computer projects are designed and customized according to the needs of the students and teachers, Anafi said.

It is a wonderful way to allow children to express themselves with a medium that facilitates the development of multiple intelligences.

All kids express their creativity in different ways. On the computer, each student can easily access the skill they are strong in – whether it is art, music, research or writing, Anafi said.

This type of learning also allows children to develop at their own pace.

Furthermore, Anafi noted, many kids who have behavioural problems in other classrooms come here and are incredibly focused and attentive.

Anafi completed a masters degree in microbiology at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem. She was a teachers' consultant in the Jerusalem division and a curriculum writer in the Israeli Ministry of Education.

In 1990, at a time when spreadsheets were hardly used in education, Anafi wrote a book describing how to integrate spreadsheets into specific areas of study.

"All of the spreadsheet activities were designed to compliment, reinforce and enrich classroom curriculum," Anafi said.

"Each activity could be implemented on three different levels to accommodate the varied needs and learning styles of students in a heterogeneous classroom."

She also wrote grade nine educational books about genetics, which include games the kids design and play.

Some of Anafi's books are still being used in Israeli schools.

Anafi has two daughters, Maayan, 13, and Gal, 11. Her husband, Moti, is a scientist.

As the computer resource teacher at USDS, Bathurst campus, Anafi builds on her Israeli background by integrating the use of games and computers into the curriculum.

"For many children, this is simply the best way to learn," Anafi said.

Secular Judaism's about honesty: Rabbi Wine

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For many, secular Judaism is a contradiction in terms. But for Rabbi Sherwin Wine, it's all about honesty.

"Our guiding principle," said the founder of Humanistic Judaism in a telephone interview, "is that we say clearly and openly what we feel. We enable people to see and feel, and to really reflect what they see and feel."

Rabbi Wine says that whatever connection is made to Judaism "should be a complete connection to what you believe. It's very important that whatever you say should ring true in your innermost being."

So in the growing number of secular, humanistic Jewish congregations in North America, "you don't have to say prayers you don't believe in. You don't have to do anything you don't believe."

That honesty, if not the theology, has been welcomed by more "conventional" Jews, Rabbi Wine says.

"What I've often received is, 'I don't agree with what you're saying, but I do respect your honesty.' I also get people saying, 'Finally! This is what I've been searching for.'"

That's not to say Rabbi Wine has been completely and warmly welcomed into all Jewish circles. Few modern Jewish thinkers have raised more hackles. But then, few Jewish thinkers, let alone rabbis, are atheists (although he doesn't trumpet that too loudly).

Nevertheless, his message has struck a chord. In Toronto, where Rabbi Wine delivered a series of lectures and presentations last weekend, the city's only secular, humanistic Jewish congregation, Oraynu ("Our Light") boasts 50 family members, and has been going strong since its founding in 1969.

Today, humanistic Judaism, which eschews religion and instead embraces cultural values that also stress the power of the individual, claims 30,000 members in some 50 North American congregations, including such high-profile Jews as Prof. Alan Dershowitz and Yehuda Bauer, the Holocaust scholar. The movement even runs two schools in Israel, where secular Judaism is growing.

Put simply, Rabbi Wine and his fellow humanists feel there is more to Judaism than God. In fact, they say, Judaism denuded of its theological baggage, of halachah, a deity, of dietary laws and observing mitzvot, can be a perfect fit – a comfortable, inviting place where no one need feel hypocritical for practicing aspects of the faith without having faith.

For these adherents, Judaism is a cultural force, a celebration of an ancient and still-strong civilization that must be nurtured if it's to survive. It's a Judaism governed by empirical reason and human needs, not necessarily by the values enunciated in the Torah.

Rabbi Wine, now 72, sees secular Judaism as part of the continuum of non-halachic Judaism begun by the Reform movement. It was embraced by such early secular Zionists as Herzl, Max Nordau and David Ben-Gurion, and by such poetic luminaries as Chaim Nachman Bialik and Yehuda Amichai (not to mention Albert Einstein and Sigmund Freud.)

Rabbi Sherwin Wine

In fact, poetry and literary readings figure prominently in secular Jewish "celebrations" (not "services"). The movement also recognizes the importance of holidays and festivals as ways to foster Jewish identity, but argues these holy days must be made relevant to the modern age.

Rabbi Wine considers Humanistic Judaism a fifth stream of the religion, and every bit as legitimate as the standard approaches. As he explains it, it rests on two main pillars: the cultural, and the teaching that "the basic power for solving human problems does not lie outside human beings, but within them. Humanistic Judaism defines a source of power."

Rabbi Wine, who was raised in a Conservative home and ordained in the Reform movement, made history in 1963 while spiritual leader of the Birmingham Temple on the outskirts of Detroit (where he's still spiritual leader). He and a handful of followers "came out," so to speak, as a congregation of Jewish atheists, and later affiliated with the international humanistic movement.

The running thread throughout Jewish history, Rabbi Wine feels, is not monotheism or halachah, "but a commitment to survival." And in the Bible, he points out, Jews are not defined by their religious beliefs, but as a nation and a great civilization.

Nevertheless, he does not oppose intermarriage.

"People have the right to marry people they love. That ethical principle outweighs group considerations. On the other hand, I would love to see connections to the Jewish community retained."

Neither does he frown on the desire by some secular Jews to light Shabbat candles or keep kosher.

"We welcome it, but not because God commanded it. We see it as another way to identify with the Jewish people."

York professor immersed in study of Germany

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

"Everyone asks me that question," Jeffery Peck chuckled without the slightest discomfort.

Why, as a scholar, is he so immersed in the study of Germany?

"I was drawn to Germany by the urge to try to figure it out," he replied.

Jewish scholars like himself are intrigued by the contradictions and complexities of German-Jewish relations, explained Peck, director of the Canadian Centre for German and European Studies at York University and the University of Montreal.

Academia

Given what happened in the 1930s and 1940s, some might assume that Jews would avoid Germany like the plague.

In fact, as he pointed out, the opposite is true. Most of the directors of similar centres in the United States are Jewish.

Formally opened in 1997 and funded by the German government, the Canadian Centre for German and European Studies focuses on contemporary Germany in its European context.

Peck, an American who assumed its directorship two years ago, taught at Georgetown University in Washington, D.C. and the University of Washington in Seattle before coming to Canada.

Concentrating on interdisciplinary German studies, he focuses on questions of national and minority identities, the relationship between literature and anthropology, multiculturalism in Germany and the United States, and German and American responses to the Holocaust.

Although Peck focused on German literature at the outset of his academic career, he has been working on Jewish issues since 1988.

Jeffery Peck

"I got into the field by studying why Jews live in Germany. I was completely taken by the topic."

In 1995, in collaboration with John Borneman of Cornell University, Peck wrote Sojourners: The Return of German Jews and the Question of Identity (University of Nebraska Press). The pair also produced a video documentary on the subject.

At the moment, Peck is finishing a volume of essays, After the Holocaust: Jews and Other Foreigners in Germany. It deals with the problems they face there.

Not surprisingly, the Canadian Centre for German and European Studies has close working relations with York University's Centre for Jewish Studies.

In addition to co-sponsoring lectures, they collaborate on joint projects. The latest is Teaching for the Future, Learning from the Past: A Holocaust and Anti-Racism Education Project for Young Educators.

It brings together university students and faculty from Canada, Germany and Poland and explores the Holocaust and racism in the context of contemporary education.

The first session, scheduled to take place in Germany and Poland this summer over three weeks, will be followed by a week-long symposium in Toronto in February 2002.

As director of the Canadian Centre for German and European Studies, Peck is mandated to fulfil three broad objectives.

The first is to educate the next generation of Canadian experts. With this in mind, the centre runs a diploma program where about 60 students are presently registered.

The other two goals are to stimulate and conduct research and to promote an awareness in Canada of German and European issues.

In this respect, Peck is particularly interested in reaching out to the Jewish community through lectures at synagogues and organizations.

He wants to develop partnerships with universities across Canada. There are already such links with McGill, Queen's, the University of Alberta and the University of Victoria. Outside Canada, partnerships with German universities in Konstanz, Mainz, Mannheim and Berlin have been established.

Peck, who has been a visiting professor at the Free University and at Humboldt University in Berlin, was born in Pittsburgh 51 years ago.

His father, Samuel, is a jeweler. Sylvia, his late mother, was a school teacher. Peck's grandparents were from Hungary and Latvia. Members of his extended family in Europe were murdered during the Holocaust, but he was not raised with that awareness.

Peck's appetite for German culture and history was whetted by studying German in high school and at Michigan State University. He completed his PhD in comparative literature at the University of California.

In 1969, he visited Germany for the first time, staying with a Protestant clergyman outside Stuttgart.

Since then, he has gone back often. "I've probably lived in Germany for about six or seven years in the last 32 years."

Like most Jews, he feels ambivalent about Germany. The German cultural and intellectual traditions that fascinate him are leavened by the spectre of the Third Reich.

Peck believes that Jews in Germany live quite comfortably, though not without ambivalence, and that xenophobia is a greater concern than anti-Semitism.

He encourages Jews to visit Germany, which, he points out, has dealt honestly with its past, nurtured its Jewish community and formed a close and strategic relationship with Israel.

"If Germany can be Israel's most important ally after the United States," he observed, "we in North America can have a differentiated attitude toward Germany."

The Red Tent

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

A sign over Anita Diamont's desk reads, "Creativity masquerades as commentary."

"It's a great line," says the author of The Red Tent, the fictionalized account of Dinah – an obscure woman in the Bible, daughter of Jacob – now in its 14th printing with over 750,000 copies sold, at once widely acclaimed by loyal fans and derided by literal readers of the Bible for taking liberties with scripture.

"What I did is nothing compared to what some of the rabbis did in making up Midrash from terse and unelaborated text," she says. "Creativity doesn't have to masquerade as anything. I wrote a work of fiction!"

Pagan gods and goddesses course though the book to the chagrin of fundamentalists. "We are talking about a world many years before Sinai, before the commandments," notes Diamont. "The women of The Red Tent are not Jewish women, not for me anyway. They are mythic ancestors of the Jewish people."

Much food for thought as I prepare dinner for my book group, meeting tonight to discuss The Red Tent.

Four years after publication, when most books would be banished to the bargain bin, its slow, steady rise in popularity may be attributed to both a clever marketing campaign to the clergy and to its overwhelming acceptance by book groups just like ours.

In the four years we have been meeting, we have grown intimate, as only women do, sharing ideas as we break bread together, nourishing our souls as well as our bodies.

"Women convene as women to celebrate themselves in all of their roles – largely in book groups," Diamont notes. "We feed each other, and we talk. Whether it's about the book is not important."

The Red Tent mirrors, like no other book we have discussed, our group itself, a classic example of life imitating art. And like any assemblage of women out of earshot of men, from the quilting bee to the college dorm, we are a red tent.

As is our custom, to enhance the mood, our meal will parallel the book. (On God of Small Things night we dined on tandori chicken, etouffee for Ya-Ya Sisterhood, pasta arrabiatta for Under the Tuscan Sun.)

To recreate an authentic biblical meal I consult Kitty Morse, whose cookbook A Biblical Feast (Ten Speed Press) meets the challenge of creating tasty dishes for the modern, sophisticated palate using only the 80 or so ingredients mentioned in the Bible, what Morse calls "the original Mediterranean diet."

"I wanted to make the recipes as authentic as possible," says Morse. "I tested and tasted, but coming from Morocco, I am very familiar with these ingredients – saffron, cumin, lentils, figs – and use them all the time. In fact, it is still the kind of cuisine eaten today in a Berber or Arab home."

For tonight's appetizer Morse suggests her Toasted Ground Almond and Sesame Dip. Like Jacob and his tribe, we will first dip bread into olive oil and then the nut mixture. Don't be put off by the nigella seeds (black cumin), Morse urges, which add a distinct, peppery flavour and are worth a trip to a Middle Eastern market.

"More than any other food, it was bread that sustained God's chosen people," she notes. "For the ancient Hebrews, bread was quite literally the staff of life." I resist the temptation to use my bread machine, reaching out in kinship to the women of the red tent as I knead and pound.

I fashion an impromptu salad from the list in Morse's cookbook: arugula, thinly sliced onion, olives, cucumbers and goat cheese.

"The cucumber was a prized food in biblical times," says Morse. "It was cool and crisp and didn't have to be cooked."

The ancient Hebrews raised ewes, goats and cows for cheese and yogurt as well as milk and butter, she adds. There will be no tomatoes or peppers in the salad tonight, as these were new world delicacies.

My dressing is olive oil, of course, and wine vinegar. I am surprised to learn that the Fertile Crescent, so rich with citrus today, bore no lemons in biblical times.

Selecting Jacob's Pottage is a no-brainer. Morse claims the hearty lentil stew may be similar to the one Jacob was served when he relinquished his birthright to Esau.

"There are 9,000 varieties of lentils catalogued today," she notes, also pointing out that because wheat was expensive, lentils were ground into meal (called pulse meal) and used to make bread.

While the concept of dessert is a more recent innovation, that does not mean our ancient forebears lacked a sweet tooth. "Refined sugars were unknown in biblical times," says Morse, "but if one were lucky enough to find a beehive, there was honey." Grapes, figs and pomegranates were also reduced to a syrupy consistency to form fruit honeys, and A Biblical Feast contains recipes for all three.

To end our repast I choose the Dried Fruit, Cinnamon and Red Wine Compote, an aromatic mélange of apricots, dates, figs and raisins. Another surprise. "Many biblical botanists believe that the unnamed fruit Eve offered to Adam was most likely an apricot." Morse reveals.

Well, there's the doorbell. All is ready. Our feast will sustain us; our words will maintain us. The bonding begins. Selah.

TOASTED GROUND ALMOND AND SESAME DIP

Variations of this delicious blend of ground nuts and spices are popular throughout the Near East, and it is not unlikely that the ancient Hebrews were familiar with one like it. Traditionally, a piece of bread is first dipped into olive oil, and then into the dry dip.

½ cup whole blanched almonds, toasted
½ tsp. whole cumin seed, toasted
2 tbsp. unhulled sesame seeds, toasted
2 tsps. nigella seeds
¼ tsp. salt

Life imitates art when it comes to The Red Tent

In a spice grinder, grain mill, or stone grinding implement (such as a Mexican molcajete), grind the almonds to the consistency of coarse bread crumbs. Transfer them to a bowl. Coarsely grind the cumin seeds and add them to the almonds. Stir in the sesame seeds, nigella seeds, and salt.

To serve, place a small bowl of extra virgin olive oil in the centre of the table, alongside a bowl of the almond mixture. To eat, dip a piece of bread in the oil, then in the almonds.

UNLEAVENED GRIDDLE BREAD

And unleavened bread, and cakes unleavened tempered with oil, and wafers unleavened anointed with oil; of wheaten flour shalt thou make them. (Exodus 29:2)

1 cup whole wheat flour
2 cups white bread flour
2 tsp. salt
1 cup 2 tbsp. water
1 tbsp. nigella seeds, or toasted and cracked coriander or toasted cumin seeds olive oil for cooking

In a large bowl, combine the whole wheat and white bread flours. Add salt and blend. Make a well in the centre. Gradually add the water, and mix thoroughly until a loose dough forms. Transfer the mixture to a lightly floured work surface. Knead until the dough becomes soft and elastic, 10 to 12 minutes. Shape the dough into a ball and let it rest for 15 to 30 minutes. Knead it again, vigorously, for 1 minute.

Preheat a cast-iron or griddle over medium high heat. Separate the dough into 8 equal balls. On a floured surface, roll out each ball of dough to a diameter of 6 in. and a thickness of 1/4 in. Sprinkle the tops with nigella seeds.

Using the rolling pin, roll the seeds into the top of the dough. Lightly coat the pan or griddle with the oil. Place the bread rounds in the pan or on the griddle, and cook until each round is dotted with dark brown spots and puffs slightly, 2 to 3 minutes per side. Stack on a plate and serve warm. Makes 8 6-in. breads.

JACOB'S POTTAGE OF LENTILS, BARLEY, MUSTARD GREENS AND MINT

Then Jacob gave Esau bread and pottage of lentils; and he did eat and drink, and rose up, and went his way: thus Esau despised his birthright. (Genesis 25:34)

Esau relinquished his birthright, the privilege and honour bestowed upon him as the first-born son, in return for some lentil stew. This hearty pottage of lentils, barley, and mustard greens seasoned with wild herbs may be similar to the one he was served. Although the ancient Hebrews cultivated the mustard plant primarily for its seed, it is likely that they enjoyed its peppery leaves as a potherb as well. Serve this stew with a loaf of fresh, warm bread.

2 tbsp. olive oil
1 onion, diced
4 cloves garlic
2 tbsp. pearl barley
3/4 cup brown lentils, rinsed, drained, and picked over
1 leek, white part only, finely diced
4 cups vegetable broth
1 bunch mustard leaves, rinsed under running water, drained and cut into thin ribbons 10 fresh mint leaves, finely chopped, or 2 tsp. dried, crushed mint leaves
salt to taste

Heat the olive oil in a large soup pot over medium high heat. Cook the onion, stirring occasionally, until golden brown, 6 to 8 minutes. Add the garlic, barley, and lentils. Cook, while stirring, until the barley turns golden; about 3 minutes. Add the leek and stock.

Cover and cook, until the barley is tender, 30 to 35 minutes. Add the mustard leaves and cook until wilted, 2 to 3 minutes. Add the mint, season with salt if necessary (if too salty, add water), and serve immediately. Serves 4 to 6.

DRIED FRUIT, CINNAMON AND RED WINE COMPOTE

8 oz. dried apricots
8 oz. pitted dates, finely chopped
4 oz. dried figs, coarsely chopped (about 3/4 cups)
4 oz. raisins (about 3/4 cups)
1 3/4 cups sweet red kosher wine or port
1 tsp. ground cinnamon
1/2 cup crushed almonds, pistachios or walnuts whole nuts for garnish

Soak the apricots in warm water until plumped, about 30 minutes. Drain and finely chop. Place the dates, apricots, figs, raisins, wine and cinnamon in a saucepan. Cook over medium heat, stirring until the mixture thickens. Add the crushed nuts, and stir to blend.

Spread the mixture on a shallow platter. Garnish with whole nuts, and serve. Supply each guest with a spoon to eat from the communal dish. Serves 4 to 6.

Downtown Dream Team

Gerald Schwartz, Chair Downtown Consortium

A who's who of Toronto's business and communal elite is the driving force behind the revitalization of the city's downtown Jewish community. It's called The Downtown Consortium.

"An initiative as ambitious at the Dream Downtown requires ambitious supporters," says Alan Sandler, President of UJA FEDERATION, which is spearheading the Jewish Toronto Tomorrow initiative.

The consortium, led by Chair, Gerald Schwartz, and Vice-Chairs, Larry Tanenbaum, Brent Belzberg, Lawrence Bloomberg, David Kassie and Stephen Pustil will help support the development of projects and partnerships to enhance Jewish life throughout the downtown core.

A number of consortium members, which include Jewish Toronto's leading philanthropists, have also stepped forward with large financial contributions to the key Downtown Dream projects: The Miles S. Nadal Community Centre and The Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life at U of T. Both projects are slated to begin construction by the Fall.

"It is truly wonderful to be in the company of so many distinguished and talented people who are galvanized by a unique and heartfelt commitment to the Dream Downtown initiatives" says Miles Nadal.

"I consider myself fortunate to have been given the opportunity to contribute to the present and future fabric of downtown Toronto." added Greg Wolfond, whose family is the leading financial force behind a new Jewish student centre at the University of Toronto.

Paying tribute to the "hard work and inspiring vision" of Dream Downtown supporters, Premier Mike Harris said that, "Ontario is fortunate to have organizations which are deeply committed to building a stronger, more vibrant Jewish Toronto."

The Dream

Miles Nadal: Back to the Future

The Nadal Family l-r: Miles, Samantha, Joanne, Renee and Sarah.

It's been a long time since Miles Nadal spent evenings and weekends shooting hoops in the gym at what was known as the "South Y". But the connection Nadal formed with what's now the Bloor Jewish community centre as a young boy is stronger today than ever before.

That's why Nadal is leading the way in re-building the facility he became so fond of in his youth.

"I grew up at the "South Y," explains Nadal, recalling summers spent at the community centre-run summer camp and basketball games with his younger brother. "For me, it was the Jewish community."

Today, in spite of its age, the centre's cultural, educational and recreational programs serves 3,000 Jewish and non-Jewish members in addition to thousands of other users who live and work in the downtown area. "The fact that the centre is bursting at the seams even though its resources are stretched to the limit attests to its values."

In order to meet the growing demands of an increasingly vibrant downtown community the existing structure is being replaced by the new Miles S. Nadal Centre.

The modern three-storey structure will feature enhanced sports, fitness and recreational facilities, a state-of the art, multi-purpose theatre as well as main floor commercial space facing Bloor Street.

Architect Geula Solow-Ruda says the new building will combine "21st century design with a celebration of urban Jewish urban life."

In providing the leading gift to the centre's redevelopment, Nadal feels he is preserving an important part of the community's past while investing in a vital part of its future. "The Bloor Jewish Community Centre, perhaps more than any other facility in the city, represents for me the continuum that is Jewish Toronto."

But Nadal's commitment to and belief in the project extends far beyond his own financial contribution. His success in exciting and motivating other donors has already helped to raise millions of additional funds for the centre, whose benefits, maintains Nadal, will reach beyond the Jewish community.

"Just as its predecessor was an important part of the broader downtown community and landscape, the new centre will continue to be a symbolic reflection of the unique multicultural character of our city. That's why the response and show of support for the project has been so great."

A leading community philanthropist Nadal is no novice to supporting worthwhile causes. By his own admission, his personal involvement and enthusiasm have never run so deep. "I like to make a difference and this project allows me to do so in a very meaningful and rewarding way. There are few things more rewarding than making a significant contribution to securing the spiritual and physical wellbeing of my community."

Theatre Pays Tribute to Al Green

A new state-of-the-art cultural centre is being built in the city's downtown core in honour one of the Jewish community's most committed leaders.

The Green Family Cultural Arts Centre will be located in the new Miles S. Nadal Community Centre, the cornerstone of the multi-million dollar Jewish Toronto Tomorrow Downtown revitalization project.

The family of well known developer, artist and community leader Al Green, is providing the lead funding to build the 350 seat, multi-purpose theatre in recognition of Green's lifetime dedication to the arts and to the Jewish community.

"My father's dream has always been to build community," notes David Green, who together with brother Barry and sisters Karen, Lindy and Donna jumped at the chance to honour their father through the JTT project.

"We support the Dream Downtown because we care deeply about preserving this vital part of the community," says Barry.

"My father's roots are in the downtown Jewish community, so naturally we were very excited to have the chance to create something special for him there," explains David, who is chairing the Jewish Toronto Tomorrow capital fundraising campaign for The Mile S. Nadal Community Centre.

"His love of and involvement in community have been an inspiration for us all, adds Karen, whose own children attend the Downtown Jewish Community School, which will also be housed in the new centre. "This is a way of showing our appreciation for all that my father and his generation have done to build Jewish Toronto.

"Philanthropy has been part of our lives from an early age," explains Lindy, a member of the Theatre Advisory Board. "We are thrilled to have the opportunity to carry on this tradition as well as my family's commitment to the arts."

Jewish Centre On Campus

Greg and Henry Wolfond

Jewish students in the downtown core will have a place to call their own thanks to the generosity of Toronto's Wolfond family.

The Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, which will be located at the corner of Harbord and Huron streets in the University of Toronto district, will serve over 4,500 Jewish U of T students.

"We realize how important it is for young people to have the opportunity to connect with their roots," says Greg Wolfond, who together with brothers Henry and Chad, are providing funding for the centre.

The centre will host a wide variety of cultural, social and educational programs including the award-winning "Colouring Ourselves" student art festival, the new graduate and young professional program and Birthright Israel. The four-level 10,000 square foot building, which will be fully accessible to students with disabilities, will feature a fireplace lounge, a spiritual centre, numerous resource rooms and a courtyard garden.

"Our objective is to design a building that is a unique symbol of Jewish Life on Campus that instills Jewish pride in the students that it serves," explains architect Susan Friedrich.

"Having a centre of our own will allow us to reach more students than ever," says Zac Kaye, Director of Jewish Campus Services which will be housed in the new centre. "The Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life will serve as beacon to inform Jewish students that at U of T there is a strong Jewish presence that is there for them."

Until now JCS staff and students have been crammed into the basement of 1200 square feet of space at University College with exposed pipes, tiny offices and no room for programs.

It's been very difficult to operate in this kind of environment and provide our students with the facility they deserve." stresses Michelle Lackie, Director of the future Wolfond Centre. "We are anxiously awaiting the opening of this exciting new building!"

SCENES FROM ISRAEL FUNWALK 2001

Some 10,000 people took part in this year's Israel Funwalk, held on May 21 – Victoria Day and Yom Yerushalayim. Participants raised more than $200,000 in the UJA FEDERATION event, now in its 31st year. Walkers and runners covered seven kilometres from Nathan Phillips Square to Ontario Place. Funwalk co-chair Elyza Litwin Polsky, seen second from left in top right photo with her mother, sister and nieces, was one of the multi-generational family participants.

Jewish War Vets meet in Ottawa

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Jewish war veterans have made a tremendous sacrifice and participated in the struggle for tikkun olam, to make the world a better place, said MP Irwin Cotler.

"You are the real heroes. You put your lives on the line so that we can live and so that these values can endure," said Cotler, speaking recently at the 11th annual dinner of the Jewish War Veterans, Ottawa Post.

Cotler spoke of the current situation in Israel and the Middle East, explaining why negotiations for peace have not been successful. "The core of the conflict," he said, "has been, since 1947, and still remains, the unwillingness of the Arab and Palestinian leaders to recognize the legitimacy of Israel as a Jewish state."

The conditions put forth by the Arabs and Palestinians for peace would ultimately result in the disappearance of Israel as a Jewish homeland, and nothing short of that will satisfy its enemies, he said.

Verna Bruce, assistant deputy minister for the Department of Veterans' Affairs, spoke on behalf of her department. "Keep telling the stories. It is important," she said. "We need to understand what it was like for you when you were 17, 18, 19, serving in Canada and in other parts of the world."

Ottawa Mayor Bob Chiarelli began his remarks with a few words in Hebrew, and then said, "On behalf of all of the citizens of Ottawa, thank you for your contribution. It is recognized, it is acknowledged and it is very much appreciated."

Although unable to attend the dinner, Israeli Ambassador Haim Divon and Rabbi Reuven Bulka, spiritual leader of Congregation Machzikei Hadas and chaplain for the Armed Forces, both sent greetings.

"Thousands of Jews have died in combat for their country and thousands more have been wounded," said Divon in a written message. "Every Jewish community in Canada made a contribution to the war effort. Let us remember and pay tribute to those who gave their lives in the Canadian Armed Forces."

Post Commander Mel Goldberg acted as master of ceremonies for the evening, which began with members of the head table being piped in to take their seats, followed by the colour party, including Morris Lang, Hy Hymes, Barry Cohen, Norman Beck and sergeant-at-arms Arnold Greenberg.

Community pays tribute to woman of 'quiet dignity'

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Naomi Bulka, wife of Rabbi Reuven Bulka, died on May 19 in Bethesda, Md., where she was undergoing medical treatment. She was 55.

Obituary

Born in England, Naomi Bulka, née Jakobovits, grew up in Montreal, where her parents George and Sessi Jakobovits still live.

She and her husband came to Ottawa shortly after they were married, when Rabbi Bulka became the spiritual leader of Congregation Machzikei Hadas.

More than 1,500 mourners attended her funeral, which was conducted by Rabbi Bulka in the synagogue on May 21.

Rabbis, dignitaries, representatives of Jewish organizations and politicians joined friends, family and congregants in paying tribute to a woman known for her quiet dignity, kindness and generosity of spirit.

Israeli Ambassador Haim Divon, former Ottawa mayors Jim Watson and Jacquelin Holzman, MP Irwin Cotler, Minister of Foreign Affairs John Manley and Imam Gamal Solaiman were among those in attendance.

"I admired and respected [Naomi Bulka] greatly," said Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray, who is a member of Congregation Machzikei Hadas and has known the Bulkas for some time.

Former governor general Ray Hnatyshyn, a longtime friend of the Bulkas, said, "Usually I'm here on happy occasions. This is tragic, such a young woman. [My wife and I] wanted to show our respect for Naomi. The service was very moving."

During the service, in which Naomi Bulka's father, three sons and a son-in-law also spoke, Rabbi Bulka said, "We are devastated, and when I say 'we,' I include everyone here." He said Naomi had never wanted to marry a rabbi, but "she landed up being the best wife a rabbi could ever have."

Naomi Bulka was involved in various community activities and causes. She greatly valued Jewish education and volunteered her time at the Ottawa Torah Institute and Machon Sarah. She also served on the mikvah committee.

She was a committed and observant Jew, people who spoke said, and she was also an intellectual and independent woman. Just as she supported her husband in every way, he, in turn, supported her decision to attend university when all of their children were old enough.

She earned a degree and immediately began working as a technical writer at Nortel Networks Corp., where she worked until very recently, when illness forced her to take a leave of absence. She not only loved her work, but appreciated the company's flex-time schedule which enabled her to work full time while still being able to prepare for and celebrate Shabbat and all the Jewish holidays. She often worked late into the night or all day on a Sunday to make up the necessary time, but she thrived on the challenges.

"In her humility and in her modesty," Rabbi Bulka said, "she never realized how much she was loved."

Naomi Bulka

In the packed sanctuary, there was one seat which was not taken. Instinctively, everyone left Naomi Bulka's usual seat in the front row, close to her husband's place on the bimah, vacant.

Naomi Bulka is survived by her husband, children Yocheved and Moshe Shonek, Shmuel and Chani Bulka, Rena and Yehuda Levy, Eliezer and Haviva Bulka and Binyomin Bulka; as well as many grandchildren, her parents, her parents-in-law, Rabbi and Mrs. Yaakov Bulka of Jerusalem, two sisters and two brothers.

A foundation in her memory is being established. For details, call 613-521-9700.

A broad cabinet shuffle likely

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

Yes, ladies and gentlemen, it's that time of year again. It seems that while every Canadian was busy on the Victoria Day weekend planting the garden, the minority of Canadians infected with the virus politicus obsessivitus pored over tea leaves trying to figure out the next great political event.

Last year, it was "Will there be an election"? This year, it's "When will the prime minister shuffle his Cabinet and how substantial a shuffle will it be?"

The one thing that all the pundits agree on is the when. We can expect the announcement at the end of June after the House recesses for the summer break.

Conventional wisdom has it that the shuffle will be relatively minor. A few lacklustre performers will be dumped and room will be made for promising new recruits. More adventurous speculators believe that the shuffle will encompass a far broader range of portfolios and set the stage for a Chrétien exit within 18 months.

Your modest scribe falls into this latter category of Ottawa watchers who believe that we are soon to witness the end game of the Chrétien era. There are two reasons.

First, it may have gone largely unnoticed by the public, but the economic statement recently presented by the minister of finance describes a two-year plan. This is a significant departure from the modern-day custom of submitting a five-year projection of government expenditures and revenue.

There can only be two rationales for this. Either the government is worried for the health of the economy in two-years time or the prime minister does not want to commit his government to programs beyond that time, namely beyond his tenure.

Since most economists believe that Canada will weather the short-term economic stresses, they have given Canada a vote of confidence for the medium and long term. Thus, we are left with the other hypothesis – which leads to the second point.

Tough as he is, and as mean as he can be to his opponents, Chrétien is first and last a Liberal. Whatever history will say about him as a prime minister, Chrétien wants to ensure that his legacy within the Liberal Party portrays him as a leader that passed on a secure and stable party to his successor. He can only guarantee that if he establishes a level playing field for all would-be successors (i.e., a large shuffle to make room for other candidates) and provides the contestants with enough flexibility to present a vision of her or his leadership platform (i.e., no constraints of a long-term budget).

Either way, there are sure to be some winners and losers. I'll look at some of them over the next while.

New CJC region chair hopes to unify community

By MARLANE PRESS
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The new chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region, says his top priorities are the unification of various organizations within the Jewish community and the promotion of human rights.

Nisson Goldman, a local lawyer and vice-chair of CJC during the 1998-2001 term, was elected at the group's recent triennial general meeting.

"During this administration, CJC hopes to assist the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver to unify organizations within the Jewish community so that when we advocate for the community, we do so with a clear voice," he said.

"The Pacific region will also continue to promote human rights and the dignity of the members of our community. As well, we will continue to fight anti-Semitic acts, publications, and Internet sites so as to isolate the perpetrators of these acts, and limit their influence and membership in every way possible," he said.

Goldman is also committed to continuing the CJC's advocacy on behalf of Israel, taking measures to protect its citizens, and ensuring Canada's support and friendship with Israel.

He also plans to address the issue of poverty, stating that CJC will assist in any way possible to relieve poverty within the Jewish community and the community at large.

Goldman was born in 1931 in Moose Jaw, Sask. He was raised in a secular home, surrounded by a small Jewish community. He lived in Moose Jaw until he moved to Vancouver at age 18.

"My upbringing wasn't really religious and we certainly weren't observant, although I knew what all the Jewish holidays were and had ideas of Jewish morality," Goldman said.

"It was a small Jewish community and I think people knew each other very well. We had a shul and I had a Jewish life. Really, it was a microcosm of what went on in other places."

Successes that CJC officials claimed in the recent past include a major initiative to fight hate on the Internet and educational outreach to the general community, especially public schools, about Jewish issues.

He plans to continue these efforts and voiced a need for more dialogue with other religious agencies, including church groups that might have common causes with CJC's agenda.

Goldman said his lifelong concern for human rights has been a natural inclination. He became involved with a human rights subdivision of the Canadian Bar Association more than 20 years ago and got involved with CJC six years ago.

He said he would like to see his group recruit and mentor more young leaders and develop stable and diversified sources of funding to allow them to do their jobs thoroughly.

"I'd like to try and foster, as much as we can, upcoming leadership in the Jewish community. I'd like to see young people brought along to participate in the community affairs."

Goldman succeeds Zena Simces, who has taken other responsibilities, including the position of chair of CJC's national social action committee.

Vice-chairs are Sheila Fruman, Mark Wexler and Tony DuMoulin. David Stewart is secretary; Renee Switzer is treasurer; and general counsel is Jonathan Festinger.

U of T Students' Law Society president looking forward to challenges

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Despite what is being portrayed in the media, the faculty of law at the University of Toronto is a warm and accepting place, says Benjamin Shinewald.

Shinewald was recently elected president of the U of T Students' Law Society, and looks forward to a challenging and rewarding few years ahead of him.

"It's no secret that this has been a tough year," Shinewald said in reference to the marks scandal that affected the school after some 30 students in the first-year class were accused of misrepresenting grades in job applications.

Benjamin Shinewald

"However, the summer is a big, long break with a third of the students leaving and a third new students coming in," Shinewald said. "And by the time school starts next year, there will be some finality to a good part of the issue.

"The important thing," Shinewald said, "is that there is a tremendous student body and a wonderful faculty here. I would like to move towards having that much more front and centre in the school."

Shinewald said he has never found any obstacles to students speaking their minds at the faculty of law. Whether on Israel-related or other issues, Shinewald feels students can freely express their opinions.

However, he said, "for a place that has such a huge Jewish contingent, the organization and the official Jewish life of the school is actually quite limited.

"There is a Jewish Law Students' Association – which holds one annual conference," Shinewald said. "It is a great conference. But that's it – just one conference each year."

On the other hand, there are a lot of unofficial Jewish events at the school, he said.

Shinewald is originally from Winnipeg and attended the Ramah Hebrew School and the Joseph Wolinsky High School.

Shinewald spent the third year of his bachelors degree at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, Israel, and then completed a bachelor of arts degree in political studies at the University of Manitoba.

He went on to pursue an internship at the Canadian Embassy in Washington, D.C, and then completed a master of science in international relations at the London School of Economics.

This summer, Shinewald will be working at a New York law firm, and once he finishes law school, is open to settling in the United States.

At the University of Toronto, Shinewald said he sees himself as president for all law students.

"I will encourage more social events for all the students here.

"Right now, there are exciting renovations going on with a magnificent lounge being planned for students and faculty.

"It will be important next year to get started on the right foot," he said. "With the right kind of activities and the right kind of atmosphere permeating from the top, there is no reason why we shouldn't have a great feeling around this place."

Memorablia sought by Hillel centres

MONTREAL — Hillel Jewish Student Centres is looking for memorabilia.

As part of an upcoming fund-raising event to be held on June 20, Hillel Jewish Student Centres will mount a retrospective of past activities and milestone events in Hillel's history.

A Generation Gap — The Debate of the Century will bring back McGill's 1960 debating champions against the current debaters at McGill in an exchange of ideas and wit.

At 7 p.m., Irwin Cotler and Gordie Echenberg will pair up once again to debate David Grossman and Gerald Pfeffer on issues including freedom of speech, capital punishment, and the '60's as a curse or a blessing on humanity.

The evening will begin with a cocktail reception to thank patrons, sponsors and benefactors.

Following the debate, people will have the opportunity to reminisce about the famous Herzog-Toynbee debate of 1961 as well as view pictures, memory books, slides and artifacts from the rich history of Hillel.

Tickets are $100 per person and $180 per couple and are available by calling the Hillel Jewish Students Centres at 845-9171 or by e-mail at info@hillel.montreal.qc.ca.

Those who can donate or lend memorabilia can call Hillel to arrange to have it picked up.

For more information, contact Melissa Margles, director, financial resource development at 514-845-9171 ext. 230 or by e-mail at melissa@hillel.montreal.qc.ca.

Student activism and charitable work

By ELISHEVA GOULD
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

I have been thinking a great deal lately about how integral the student's role has been in inspiring social change over the last century.

In the early 1900s, students were among those who initiated and weathered long, gruelling strikes to improve labourers' rights. A few decades later, students led political rallies, voicing themselves against extremist regimes, even fighting in underground movements and risking their own lives to save others'. The Civil Rights Movement was driven by countless students and young adults who joined hands in the difficult struggle against ingrained, institutionalized racism and discrimination.

My own father, at the age of 19, risked his life to participate in the Freedom Summer of '64, going down to Mississippi to teach literacy and helping his black pupils register to vote.

Whether as riotous protesters or as conscientious objectors, young adults have been in the forefront of political activism and advocacy again and again, waking up the world to each generation's crucial humanitarian causes.

Slowly and steadily, student activists have helped facilitate drastic change; their voices of reason and simple humanity have forever altered our history and society.

Whether one looks back on such events with nostalgia, pride or imagination, the spirit of those times is not dead. One only has to turn on the TV to see how young adults still lead important political demonstrations across Europe or fill busloads across Canada and the United States heading off to make their statements against the World Trade Organization or the Summit of the Americas.

Many of the students I know choose to make their marks closer to home, working at the food bank, volunteering at shelters, donating their money and belongings, and giving freely of their time to help homeless individuals. One of my friends is working to change the policy regarding students with learning disabilities at his Ivy League college to make it more inclusive and more just.

All these acts of advocacy are not only student-motivated, but Jewishly-motivated as well. The concept of tikkun olam – of doing our part to help repair the world and diminish its injustices – speaks to both students and Jews. What better place can there be for a centre for Jewish students to initiate and participate in acts of tikkun olam than a Jewish student organization on a university campus?

The Jewish Student Union (JSU) at the University of Toronto will officially become a Tzedek Hillel in the 2001-2002 school year. This $10,000 commitment – half from the JSU's budget and half from Hillel International – will provide us with resources and conferences to help us inspire and launch various new charitable projects and initiatives.

Tzedek Hillel works on a "CASE" methodology – community partners, advocacy, service (or volunteerism) and education.

In a move toward anticipating and solidifying such a commitment, U of T's JSU recently held a small Alternative Reading Week retreat. As one of the participants, I volunteered at an "Out of the Cold" soup kitchen, serving food to and hanging out with some of Toronto's hungry and/or homeless people. That evening, we met and shared stories with people with real problems and real ideas about the assistance they need.

Another night, we went out on the Street Help vans jointly run by the Native Men's Residence and Ve'ahavta, the Toronto-based Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee, providing food, clothing, warmth and comfort to those living on our streets.

During the day, we met with some inspiring people – young and old – who have picked themselves up from the depths of despair, drug addiction and abusive homes, and who have proved that, with the charity, love and support of caring people, it can be done.

We also met with a high school student who works with Toronto's Craig Kielburger – who, when he was in Grade 6, founded and chaired Free the Children, a non-profit organization run entirely by children for children – to help free youth from the slavery and torture of child labour. Craig has travelled to several Third World countries to meet and talk to the children and families he and his organization were going to help. Listening to Craig's colleague, we all thought: "If these kids can accomplish so much, then so can we!"

The "tzedek" in Tzedek Hillel means "righteousness" and "justice" – finding something that has gone wrong in our society and making the commitment and the effort needed to remedy it. This essence of the word "tzedek" – the root of the word "tzedakah," which means so much more than just giving charity – is what I have gleaned from my volunteer work over the past few years.

Last summer in Israel, I volunteered for Danny Siegel and his non-profit "Ziv" Tzedakah Fund. Among the many projects the fund undertakes, it helps find meaningful work for people who are crushed by mental illness and depression; provides school supplies and children's clothing, even shoes and wedding dresses for people in need; provides Shabbat meals for hungry families; and works with people with severe physical challenges.

It is vital that we all devote some time in our lives, even if it's only a few times a year, to help those who need it.

The world still needs our help.

As a student – and as a Jew – I look forward to continuing my work of incorporating more "tzedek" and "tzedakah" into the ways I conduct my life and reach out toward others in need.

There are so many causes out there – so many needs to be filled, so much pain to be eased, so many troubles to be worked out – it doesn't matter which side we're on politically, or what we choose to put our time and energy into. What matters only is that we do.

One of Ve'ahavta's mottos, a quote from Rav Nachman of Breslav, reads: "If you believe you can spoil, believe you can fix."

I think we all know how badly many aspects of our world have been spoiled… now all we have to do is believe in our power, as students and human beings, to repair – and actively take part in such righteous endeavours.

Innovative interdisciplinary studies at Hebrew U

JERUSALEM — Combined computer science/life sciences studies and psychobiology are among the most competitive, sought-after areas of study at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem for the 2001-2 academic year, according to initial figures compiled after completion of the first round of registration.

In the computer science/life science integrated program for undergraduates, only about five percent of those applying will be accepted, said student registration authorities, while in psychobiology, the acceptance figure is about nine percent. In general, there is high demand at the university for studies in life sciences, medical sciences and agricultural-related sciences.

Hebrew University president Prof. Menachem Magidor said that the rapid development of biotechnological research and industry in Israel has had a direct effect on the growing number of students seeking education in areas in those fields. Magidor emphasized that the university offers varied graduate study opportunities for students interested in science and high technology careers, including biotechnology.

The number of those seeking admission has remained consistent with last year for this period, he noted. Registration will remain open following the initial registration period for most departments, depending on available spaces remaining.

In recent years, the Hebrew University has focused on creating several innovative, interdisciplinary programs which combine studies from various faculties and departments.

A new program, instituted this year, provides special loans with preferential, no-interest repayment terms to encourage students to pursue their studies in Jerusalem. Subject to certain criteria, the loans can even be turned into grants.

Banquet hall collapse

By EDGAR ASHER
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — A four-storey wedding hall in the Talpiot district of Jerusalem collapsed late last Thursday night, killing at least 25 people.

More than 300 people were reported injured and scores were still believed to be buried under the rubble Friday morning. Hundreds of ambulances were called in to take the injured to hospitals in the area and beyond, as emergency facilities became full.

This tragedy is believed to be the worst civilian disaster of its type in Israel's history. The ceremony on the upper floor of the building had ended and guests were dancing when the floor gave way, crashing through floor after floor to the ground. About 650 people were in the hall at the time.

The reason for the collapse was unknown at press time, but Jerusalem police said there was no terror element involved and no explosion.

IDF: 'Arafat won't sign interim deal; violence to grow'

By AMIR OREN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The current conflict between Israel and the Palestinians will continue for many months, maybe even years, although the number of casualties is expected to rise and the methods used by both sides are likely to intensify, according to a strategic evaluation by the Israel Defence Forces.

The General Staff Operations Directorate also predicts that Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat will refuse to negotiate a long-term interim agreement with Israel and will insist on a permanent status agreement under which a Palestinian state will be established within the pre-1967 borders with Jerusalem as its capital and with the right of return for the refugees.

Despite the fact that Arafat would rather leave this to the next generation of Palestinian leaders than give up on these beliefs, Israel must continue to see him as the one who can bring about a "steady pacification" of the conflict. The PA is far from collapse and even if its security forces are not in control of all the population, Arafat still has a high degree of control over the heads of these forces.

According to the IDF's evaluation of the situation, Israel must attempt to disassociate the Palestinian conflict from the conflict with its northern neighbours – Syria and Lebanon – by efficient but selective responses to any provocative acts by Hezbollah.

The PA is far from collapse

Syria does not want a war with Israel; the air force's strike against a Syrian radar station just outside of Beirut in April left a deep impression on Damascus, aware that it was just the start of what Israel can do.

The Operations Directorate's report was presented to Chief of Staff Shaul Mofaz and other IDF generals, as well as to Defence Minister Benjamin Ben Eliezer, who passed it on to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon. It will soon be presented to the cabinet for discussion.

The Operations Directorate continues to produce the reports, shooting down the expectations which followed the establishment of the National Security Council. It does not offer recommendations for direct action by the politicians, but rather offers preferred military and diplomatic alternatives. Among these alternatives are an effort to halt the violence and to use restraint so as to avoid an all-out conflagration, which was the IDF's policy before the intifadah began and still is.

The Operations Directorate and other IDF units prefer to continue with the policy of presenting the Palestinian with a united military front, though they see the need to signal to the Palestinians as well as the Americans that Israel is ready to compromise if the violence stops.

Finalized before Sharon's announcement last week of a unilateral cease-fire, the report also finds that neither side has used all its force against the other and that there will be a limited escalation. It predicts that a diplomatic conflict will develop over the endorsement of the Mitchell Commission report by the Bush administration, with both sides making an all-out effort to delegitimize the other in the Americans' eyes: Arafat will take a stand against the Israeli occupation and the settlements, while Israel will push the issue of the terrorist attacks.

Arafat's hope of exhausting Israeli society through violence, of hoping to push the government into making further concessions, is all but dead. Arafat is also trying to isolate Israel in the international arena. The IDF believes that Arafat does not have a definite plan for the next stages of the conflict, apart from his basic aims, and he is playing it by ear. The army does not believe that there are any players in the Middle East – not Israel, Jordan, Egypt, Syria or the Palestinians – that want to see the conflict escalate into an all-out war.

Suicide bombers strike

As The CJN was going to an early press deadline on May 25, news was received of two suicide bombings in Israel.

Early Friday morning in Hadera a car loaded with explosives was driven by two people into a bus stop. At least one person, not including the two people in the car, was killed and 14 injured. Islamic Jihad took credit for the action.

Also on Friday, a truck laden with explosives attempted to crash into an IDF base in southern Gaza. The explosives did not ignite, and IDF forces fired on the truck. No injuries were reported among the IDF personnel.

German firms give OK for slave labour payments

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BERLIN — German firms have dropped their opposition to releasing funds for Nazi-era slave and forced labourers.

Industry representatives announced last week that they are now satisfied with the degree of protection from future lawsuits provided by American courts.

The firms had been unwilling to release their half of the $5-billion fund until their lawyers could ensure "legal closure" – that is, a promise that no more lawsuits relating to the Nazi era will be filed.

The firms' announcement paves the way for the German Parliament to approve release of the funds. Parliament was slated to deal with the issue on May 30.

In another development that hastened the release of the funds, a U.S. judge dismissed a class-action lawsuit by former Nazi-era slave laborers against German companies.

The decision by Judge Shirley Wohl Kram could help pave the way for payments to begin in mid-July.

"It is my hope that payments begin immediately," Kram said.

Manfred Gentz, president of DaimlerChrysler and director of the German Industry Foundation, "Remembrance, Responsibility and Future," said last week that he expected the funds to be available shortly, in light of Kram's dismissal.

German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder greeted the announcement with relief and thanked all those who made it possible "to close this painful chapter of German history."

The announcement followed days of intensifying pressure from survivor representatives, German politicians and even from within the industry foundation's own ranks.

Critics had said that, thanks to the U.S. appeals court ruling, sufficient legal protection had been achieved – and the industry foundation should acknowledge this.

In its ruling, the court removed all conditions from a U.S. lower court judge's previous dismissal of lawsuits against German banks.

German politicians and survivor representatives alike hailed the U.S. appeals court decision.

Otto Lambsdorff, the German government's chief negotiator for the fund, called the ruling "superb."

With the new co-operative mood on the part of the industries and the likely Parliament approval May 30, payments to survivors may begin within a few weeks.

Individuals and groups representing the labourers have called for the money to be distributed quickly.

The industries' decision to drop their resistance may have been influenced by last-minute pressure from 43 of the 6,000 German companies that contributed to the fund.

In an open letter to Schroeder last week, the firms urged the chancellor to pay the aging survivors before they die.

In their letter, they said 200 survivors die each day.

The German government and a group of German businesses agreed in February 1999 to create the $5.2 billion fund to compensate the labourers.

Under the terms of an agreement reached in March 2000, some 240,000 slave labourers – about 140,000 of whom are Jewish – would receive up to $7,500 each. More than 1 million forced labourers would get up to $2,500 each.

People whose property was looted by the Nazis, who were victims of Nazi medical experiments or who hold unpaid Holocaust-era insurance policies also may claim payments.

The high price of the intifadah

By NEHEMIA STRASLER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Before the intifadah began last fall, the Israeli and Palestinian economies were looking better than ever. Israel was reaping the benefits of a thriving, cutting-edge, start-up industry, with an unheard-of growth rate of 8-9 percent during the first three quarters of 2000. The Palestinians' standard of living was also making impressive leaps. The Palestinian Authority (PA) was working on plans for six giant shopping malls on the invisible border separating Israel and the Palestinian territories to attract even more Israelis to shop on the West Bank.

Comment

So it is especially painful and disappointing to realize just how much wealth, how many golden opportunities for development, for improvement in living standards and for the broadening of intellectual horizons have been lost by both sides as a result of the fighting that began late last September.

• Economic growth. The first intifadah casualty was economic growth. Tourism was devastated almost instantly. The construction sector plunged into a deep hole, after only just having shown some signs of recovery midway through 2000. Other economic sectors soon also began showing the intifadah's harsh impact. Before the latest violence, economic growth was anticipated to reach 5-6 percent in 2001. Now, however, it is clear that growth will not exceed 1-2 percent, which means a 4-percent production loss – that is, a shortfall of $4 billion, or approximately NIS 6,000 per family in Israel.

However, since nothing is straightforward in economics, it is not absolutely certain that the entire loss can be attributed solely to the intifadah. After all, the Israeli economy sustained a severe blow in the last quarter of 2000 when the Nasdaq stock market crashed, and Israel's start-up companies were badly shaken.

• The flow of investment capital into Israel. The billions of overseas dollars that poured into the Israeli economy last year have simply dried up. The entire flow of investment capital from abroad seems to have evaporated overnight. The principal reason is the crisis among the start-up firms, which once had no trouble raising billions of dollars on the Nasdaq. Less foreign investment capital means a more sluggish growth rate for the economy. A dramatic decline can also be observed in domestic investments, which are shying away because of the increased military risks.

• Unemployment. Although the latest figures do not indicate it yet, this year's reduced economic growth rate will inevitably translate into a higher unemployment rate.

• International credit rating. The international credit rating firm, Fitch, announced last week there was a solid chance that it would soon lower Israel's international credit rating because of the deterioration in the security situation since the publication of Fitch's previous report in December 2000, and because of the slim prospects for an easing of tensions or for a renewal of the peace process. A lower international rating for Israel would have a grave impact on the national economy, forcing Israeli companies negotiating loans overseas to pay higher interest rates. This, in turn, would reduce the desire to invest, down-scale production levels and ultimately raise the unemployment rate.

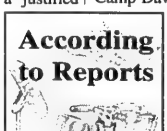
• The state budget. Last week, the government decided to slash NIS 2.8 billion from the various ministerial budgets, in order to have the cash to cover the additional costs being incurred by the defence establishment, because of both the intifadah and other threats emanating from the region. Budget-slashing on such a scale will deliver a harsh blow to everything in Israel, particularly its social services and its infrastructure, which is losing NIS 350 million from the Ports and Railways Authority's budget. For example, less money will mean the temporary shelving of a double-track rail line for Be'er Sheva.

• The European Union. Israeli exports to EU countries have, up until now, enjoyed a preferential status that have taken the form of a total customs exemption. But EU pressure is mounting for the imposition of full customs duties on all Israeli exports that have originated in the industrial zones or agricultural areas of the territories. The rationale for this pressure is the argument that the settlements are not part of Israel proper. Such an EU decision would make exports less attractive, which would result in a further decline in economic activity – and the inevitable further rise in unemployment.

• The long-term impact. The economy is in the adjustment stage, re-organizing to deal with the new situation. Private consumption is surprisingly on an upward swing, but there are long-term implications. If the fighting and the bombings continue, if Israel is again perceived as a garrison state and an international outcast, the economic repercussions will be sombre indeed: investment funding will shrivel up, the prospects for future economic growth will fade, the gloomy economic climate will become even gloomier, and the low morale of the Israeli public will sink even lower.

Reporters, even in opinion, should be fair

Since the outbreak of Palestinian violence last September, Palestinian leaders and their supporters abroad have insisted that the present uprising is a justified reaction against "occupation" in order to achieve statehood in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.



This interpretation stands at complete variance with mainstream analysis in Israel and many western circles, which argues that Arafat's real agenda is more insidious. As New York Times columnist Tom Friedman recently put it, Arafat "apparently has not given up his long-term aim of eliminating Israel." He hopes to accomplish this by arousing international pressure, under the glare of sympathetic media, to force unilateral Israeli concessions and to coerce Israel into accepting the "right of return," an action that would effectively destroy the Jewish State.

As the memory of Arafat's rejection of Israel's generous offers at Camp David recedes, it is disturbing to find an increasing number of journalists reporting the Palestinian interpretation of their "uprising" as fact, and ignoring the alternative accounts.

Sandro Contenta for the Toronto Star does this repeatedly, whether unwittingly or not. So, too, does CBC TV reporter Neil Macdonald – in direct violation of the CBC's own guidelines emphasizing fairness and balance. For instance, in his report for the National on May 7, Macdonald began as follows: "The Israeli army now has blanket permission from its government to strike inside the area of Palestinian self-rule. It says it must do this in order to defend itself against what it calls terrorists, the armed Palestinians battling the Israeli occupation."

Notice the qualification of the word "terrorists," and the absence of any qualification around the words "battling the Israeli occupation." As Macdonald reports it, the "Israeli occupation" is not something the Palestinians "call it"; rather, it is passed off as a fact.

As Israel intensified its reaction to the terrorist attack in Netanya on May 18, Macdonald turned his attention in an increasingly opinionated way by expressing his disapproval of Israel's use of F-16's. In response to a question posed by a CBC anchor about world attitudes, Macdonald went so far as to say, "I think it's probably fair to say that Israel has got a long history of not particularly caring what the rest of the world thinks. It believes that it is its prerogative to deal with the Palestinians as it sees fit, and Israel does not tolerate resistance to its occupation of the Palestinian territories. All that really matters to the Israeli leadership, be it left-wing or right-wing leadership, is the disapproval or the approval of the United States of America, which is Israel's main sponsor and one of its greatest funders, and George W. Bush has pretty much consistently come down on the Israeli side and bought the Israeli line that this is self-defence."

Even when he gives analysis, Macdonald is still bound, as a reporter, to be fair and impartial. But here again, he offers only an interpretation of events partial to the Palestinian perspective.

There is a clear line between commentary (opinion) and impartial reporting (including analysis), one that Macdonald has crossed.

Naomi Klein continues her campaign for workers' rights

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — As countries become "hospitable to trade, they're being asked to give up democracy," author and activist Naomi Klein says.

One of the country's most identifiable political activists, Klein, 29, was the featured guest at a speaker's series organized by the Danforth Jewish Circle (DJC). The Globe and Mail columnist is the author of the international best seller No Logo, an exposé of free trade and multinational marketing.

Naomi Klein

No Logo, published by Alfred A. Knopf Canada last year, recently netted Klein the $10,000 Canadian Business Book Award. The paperback edition, released this year, has been at the top of the bestseller list for the last three months.

Most of the more than 25,000 protesters who had gathered there accepted free trade, but oppose the growing power of multinational corporations and the weakening of democracies, Klein said.

She condemned the gratuitous use of tear gas, noting that gas was sprayed in areas quite a distance from where the political leaders were meeting.

Demonstrations by international groups of protesters have marked all international trade summits since the 1999 Seattle summit. And while the convergence of protesters in Seattle took political leaders and the established media by surprise, Klein had actually anticipated the emergence of large-scale international protests in No Logo.

"I predicted this would happen in Seattle, Washington and Windsor," Klein told The CJN in an earlier interview.

The timing of No Logo was quite propitious, she said: it was released shortly after the Seattle summit, which drew some 48,000 protesters.

"A lot of people didn't think there was a movement. Seattle was seen as a big breakthrough, all of these international happenings were ignored by mainstream and activist press."

A political activist since her student days at the University of Toronto, Klein said she became curious about the power of branding and the multinationals.

"I wanted to know for myself. [It was] the visceral reaction to the trend. Did it fit into a larger system?"

Branding, she explains in No Logo, is the "marketing renaissance of the late '80s and early '90s, which focused on the image-building of brands, so that a brand became synonymous with an experience or lifestyle."

"Nike, for example, is leveraging the deep emotional connection that people have with sports and fitness," she writes.

She details the name-brand companies' shift from producing to marketing goods – they began contracting out the manufacturing to factories located in free trade zones in various third world countries.

Klein documents the poor working conditions in the free-trade zones; workers often accept these conditions because owners can easily shut down their factories and move to countries with fewer restrictions.

No Logo was born out of some articles Klein wrote when covering some of the international campaigns for the Village Voice and Ms. magazine, she said.

She said she networked with other activists on the Internet and got regular updates on their campaigns.

"There was an amazing group campaigning for labour rights," she said. "There are a coalition of different, smaller anti-sweatshop groups in Asia and Latin America. They produce great research."

She discovered that the Internet was an important communication link between the various international activists.

"It was my first exposure into how powerful the Internet was. I caught onto that fairly quickly."

After the book deal was signed, Klein also travelled extensively to do her research, visiting free trade zones in Indonesia and the Philippines.

"The book took four years," Klein said.

She said her friend Gerard Greenfield helped her establish contact with activists in Cavite, the largest free trade zone in the Philippines. (Cavite is located in Rosario, a town 90 miles south of Manila.)

"There was this worker committee [in Rosario] according to Gerard that was doing the most innovative work. It's so hard to organize [there]... In China it's illegal."

These activists in Rosario were aided by a Roman Catholic priest who wanted to improve the conditions of his parishioners, she explained. She said visiting Cavite was "the most dramatic moment" in writing No Logo because she got to see "how the activists' campaigns were affecting workers."

Klein's been thrilled with the response to No Logo, which has been translated into several languages and has had multiple publishings in Great Britain, she said.

"I can't not be happy with the book. It has been received better than I had ever hoped. The book is getting out there.

"The mail has been fantastic. I get wonderful letters from young people. Young activists have been really important to me. It's hard to be a young activist."

13th ANNUAL JEWISH BOOK AWARDS TO HONOUR MATT COHEN, AL WAXMAN

The committee behind the annual Canadian Jewish Book Awards recently released a list of the dozen winners it plans to honour next week at a festive gathering in Toronto.

In choosing the winners, the committee assessed the relative merits of more than 50 books submitted from across Canada.

"It was a wonderful embarrassment of riches which demonstrates the vitality of Jewish writing and scholarship in Canada," said committee co-chair Frances Mandell.

Honoraria – cash prizes – are associated with some, but not all, of the awards.

Author Michael Kaufman takes the prestigious Beatrice and Martin Fischer fiction prize for his first novel, The Possibility of Dreaming On A Night Without Stars (Viking).

Another high-profile award winner is Erna Paris, whose recent non-fiction work Long Shadows (Knopf Canada) has garnered the history prize. Long Shadows has already won two prestigious Writers Trust of Canada awards, totalling $20,000 in prizes.

As a highlight of this year's awards ceremonies, the committee is honouring the memories of the late writer Matt Cohen and the late actor-director Al Waxman by bestowing Biography Awards on their respective works – Cohen's Typing: A Life in 26 Keys (Random House), and Waxman's That's What I Am (Malcolm Lester Publishing).

Broadcaster Andy Barrie, host of CBC's Metro Morning, is slated to read selections from both autobiographies as a tribute to Cohen and Waxman.

Other winners:

- Franklyn Bialystok won the Canadian Jewish History prize for Delayed Impact (McGill-Queen's University Press);
- Irene Watts won the Young Adult Fiction prize for Remember Me (Tundra);
- Editor Barry Dov Walfish won the Biblical Scholarship prize for Apples of Gold in Settings of Silver (Pontifical Institute of Medieval Studies);
- Vivian Felsen won a Yiddish (translation) prize for Montreal of Yesterday (Vehicule);
- Gitel Donath won the Holocaust Memoir prize for My Bones Don't Rest in Auschwitz (Kaplan);
- Karen Shenfeld won the poetry prize for The Law of Return (Guernica);
- Howard Margolian won the Jewish Scholarship prize for Unauthorized Entry (University of Toronto);
- Editors F. DeCosta and Bernard Schwarz won a Holocaust history prize for The Holocaust's Ghost (Univesity of Alberta);
- And the Beth Tzedec Reuben and Helene Dennis Museum won the newly-instituted prize in World Jewish Culture for the cookbook Art and Tradition: Treasures of Jewish Life, edited by curator Dorion Liebgott.

Sponsored by the Koffler Centre of the Arts, the 13th annual Jewish Book Awards ceremony is set for Wednesday June 6, 7:30 p.m. at the Leah Posluns Theatre. Admission to the celebration and the reception that follows is free. All are welcome.

Tribute to Itzik Manger: Gerry Kane, chair of the national committee for Yiddish of the Canadian Jewish Congress, speaks (in Yiddish and English) on From Grey to Blue – The Essence of Itzik Manger, and singer-pianist Nina Shapilski performs at an evening of tribute to the famous late Yiddish poet on the occasion of his 100th birthday.

Admission $3. Workmen's Circle Centre, 471 Lawrence Ave. W. Sunday June 3, 7:30 p.m.

Time of your Life: This celebration honouring adults ages 55+ features a fashion show, beverage demonstration, line dancing, photography display and much more. Guest speaker, Dr. Herbert Lee. Door prizes, free samples. Free admission.

Bernard Betel Centre, 1003 Steeles Ave. W. Wednesday June 6, 10:30 a.m. to 3 p.m. 416-225-2112, ext. 126, Joan Turner.

Music of Holocaust victims to come to life

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The music of four Jewish composers who died in the Holocaust will be featured at a concert honouring the memory of all the musicians who died in the war.

Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies, an international human rights organization dedicated to preserving the Holocaust's memory, will present Music of the Lost Composers at the Glenn Gould Studio, 250 Front St. West, main floor, CBC Building, on Monday, June 4, at 8 p.m.

The four superbly talented composers being featured are Victor Ullman, Gideon Klein, Laszlo Weiner and Erwin Schulhoff.

The music will be performed by the New World Symphony Orchestra of Toronto, an ensemble of Canada's finest musicians made up of members of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, The Canadian Opera Company and The National Ballet of Canada.

Sherry Kaufman (left) and Bonnie Goldstein, co-chairs of the Music of the Lost Composers concert for the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center For Holocaust Studies.

Stefanos Karabekos, the artistic director who will conduct the concert, is renowned as both a conductor and composer. He has conducted numerous concerts throughout Canada as well as in his native country of Greece.

"The composers we honour at this concert are representative of the many musicians who perished in the Holocaust," says Bonnie Goldstein, co-chair of the concert along with Sherry Kaufman.

"It is important to keep on remembering, and to realize that a concert such as this illustrates that the Nazi plan to stifle Jewish life and creativity was a failure," Goldman says.

"The preservation of the scores for these works, especially since two were actually written in Terezin, is a near miracle," Kaufman says. She notes that survivors hid them and smuggled them through the war's chaotic years.

"Music is still coming to light," she says. "For example, one of Klein's pieces was only discovered in a bundle of papers by accident in 1990. I believe that this will be an evening that will touch everyone's heart."

In addition, three survivors – Anita Ekstein, Elly Gotz and Nate Leipciger – have been selected to speak about the lives and accomplishments of each of the composers.

"Remembering these composers brings their legacies to the present," Goldstein says. "We are fortunate to bring to life this remarkable evening of music that was all but lost forever."

For tickets to the concert or for more information, call 416-864-9735 or 1-866-864-9735.

Kippur recreates an era most would rather forget

By RONALD CHARLES EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

On Oct. 6, 1973, Yom Kippur, Egyptian and Syrian forces invaded Israel, sparking a war that traumatized the country's population, especially the young reservists called up to fend off the attacks.

One of them, Amos Gitai, in collaboration with writer Marie-Jose Anselme, recalls the conflict in Kippur, a drama that has been screened at the Cannes, Toronto International and Toronto Jewish film festivals.

Kippur is opening June 1 at selected theatres.

The simple plot follows two reservists, Weinraub (Liron Levo) and Ruso (Tomer Ruso), who unsuccessfully attempt to join their unit, which has left for the Syrian front without them. Instead, they join a helicopter evacuation unit that operates in the Golan Heights.

Liron Levo, as Sgt. Weinraub, establishes his character as a man of his time. The young leftist who buys used cars on principle has been replaced by materialistic yuppies.

Israel's lack of military preparedness revealed flaws and tensions, which are subtly reflected in this story. Amir (Juliano Merr), the captain, says that when then defence minister Moshe Dayan asked to be flown on an inspection tour, Amir told him to go "to the bus station."

The plot is an implicit condemnation of the system. That two soldiers are unable to join their units is a poor reflection on a mobilization system that, during the Six Day War, was cited for its efficiency.

Gitai, whose last film was the controversial Kadosh, skilfully recreates the Israel of the 1970s by filming old urban districts, military installations and timeless rural settings. The silence of an aging inner-city neighbourhood visually communicates the fact that it is a holy day. Anyone who has ever visited Israel will recognize it in the film.

Though the story's slow pacing lacks an obvious narrative, at best reflecting wartime realities, this director nevertheless honours his generation by recreating an era that others would rather forget.

Filmmaker documenting blood libel trial

By BEN ROSE
Special to CJN

TORONTO — A documentary filmmaker is telling the story of Mendel Beilis "to reaffirm my own Jewishness and for generations in the future."

Beilis was falsely accused of murdering a 13-year-old Christian boy in Poland in 1913 to use the child's blood in making matzot.

Albert Maysels, 74, who is married to a Catholic, recently told the Toronto Jewish Film Festival (TJFF) that, after a long search, he found Beilis's 92-year-old daughter in the Bronx and has also spoken to Beilis's three elderly nieces.

Beilis went to Israel after the "blood libel" trial, did not fit in there, and came to Brooklyn where, Maysels said, he was a "failed life insurance salesman." He died in 1941, leaving a wife and five children.

The Beilis case promoted "blood libel" propaganda against Jews in Poland, which, Maysels said, is still prevalent.

The filmmaker, one of the first to use a hand-held camera in "cinéma verité" style, showed a six-minute excerpt of Jews on Trial and said he expected the finished product to be shown around the world in a year or two.

The excerpt dealt with the difficulties Maysels had in finding Beilis's daughter, and finally showed her inviting him to lunch at a shelter for women in the Bronx if he could produce 60 cents to pay for his lunch.

Maysels said he has been to Israel three times and intends to go again to track down further details about Beilis's life.

Maysels and his son David visited Kiev last September, obtained a transcript of the trial, visited the prison where Beilis was held for two years, talked to Jews who remembered the case, and charged that Czar Nicholas had engineered the guilty verdict.

He said one of the prosecuting attorneys was so anti-Semitic that he had his office walls plastered with photos of Jewish noses.

He added that, for the first time, he will take a prominent part in the film, because in essence the film is about "what it means to be Jewish."

An artist always puts some of his own biography in his work, he said.

Maysels, a late addition to the TJFF program, was introduced "as one of the great documentary filmmakers of the age," by director Shlomo Schwartzberg, at the free event at the Bloor Cinema.

Maysels referred to one of his films, titled Salesman, about four Irish Bible salesmen working in Boston, and compared one of them to his own father, who wanted to be a musician "of clean hands and a pure heart."

The memory of his father has similarly urged him to make a film "from the heart," about the Beilis affair, he said.

Maysels said he found the grave of the young boy supposedly murdered by Beilis in Kiev to be "hyped and covered with flowers," adding that the patriarch of the Russian Orthodox church has recently called for him to be made a saint.

After World War II, he said, a pamphlet attacking the Jews for "blood libel" was distributed in a Polish town and resulted in a pogrom in which 40 Jews died.

Unlike his father, Beilis was not an Orthodox Jew and was working in a brick factory on the Sabbath when he was arrested.

In Kiev people went out of their way to help Maysels, said Ukrainian-born Konstantin Selezen, himself a documentary filmmaker, who acted as interpreter and guide in Kiev, and joined Maysels on the platform.

They were surprised to find a statue of Sholom Aleichem in the city. "That wouldn't have been allowed 20 years ago," Maysels said.

KLEZMER CONCERT: Toronto klezmer band Beyond the Pale celebrates the release of their CD Routes (available from Borealis Records) with a concert at the Tranzac Club 292 Brunswick (south of Bloor) on June 3 at 8 p.m. Beyond the Pale is a unique modern ensemble rooted firmly in the spirit and forms of klezmer music. It flirts with elements of other eastern European folk styles (Romanian, Ukrainian, Roma, Balkan) and modern North American styles like reggae and funk. Led by Eric Stein on mandolin and tsimbl, Beyond the Pale includes Anne Lindsay (violin), Sasha Luminsky (accordian), Martin van de Ven (clarinet) and Brent Higgins (bass). They will be joined by guests Dave Wall, Rick Lazar, Josh Engel and Dan Goldman. Call 416-530-4288 or visit www.beyondthepale.net.

FOSSE

The CJN is giving away 6 pairs of tickets to the opening night of Fosse. Performance date is Tues., June 19, 8 p.m., at The Pantages Theatre.

Rules: To be eligible to win a pair of tickets to Fosse, please print your name, address and daytime phone number on a piece of paper along with the answer to this question:

What year did Fosse win a Tony Award for Best Musical?
(Hint: the answer is printed elsewhere in this newspaper!)

All correct answers received by 3 p.m. on Friday, June 8, 2001 are eligible. The winning entry will be randomly selected from all correct answers received at The CJN offices on Monday, June 11, at 10 a.m. The winner will be notified the same day. Odds of winning depend on the number of entries received. The CJN will not enter into any correspondence with contestants.

Send your response to: Fosse Contest, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ont. M3B 3K4 or fax to: Fosse Contest, 416-391-0949.

Employees and family members of The Pantages Theatre or The CJN are not eligible to enter.

Golf, boating are some of the things to do in Newport Beach

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

NEWPORT BEACH, Calif. — Nicknamed "The Colourful Coast" for its blue skies, vivid sunsets and sandy white beaches, this southern California resort community has a plethora of activities for visitors.

Overlooking the Pacific Ocean, Newport Beach is made up of unique villages including Balboa Island, Balboa Peninsula, Cannery Village, Mariner's Mile, Corona Del Mar, Fashion Island, Newport Center, Lido Marina Village and Back Bay Reserve. The mild Mediterranean-like climate is the reason the population of 70,202 swells to 100,000 every summer. Newport Beach's warm sun and cool sea breezes make it easy to enjoy the many outdoor activities offered. Golf lovers are attracted to the area's greens such as the Aliso Viejo Golf Club, Strawberry Farms Golf Club and Tustin Ranch Golf Club. The Pelican Hill Golf Club, near Newport's financial and hotel districts offers two award-winning courses.

Golf Magazine wrote, "Pelican Hill Golf Club offers the 36 best holes of public access golf in Southern California."

Bicycles and boats can be rented throughout the Newport Beach community. A wond-erful place to explore by foot, kayak, canoe or bike is the Upper Newport Bay Ecolog-ical Reserve or "Back Bay", a 752-acre coastal wetland and home to 200 rare and endangered bird species.

It is Southern California's largest estuary, with a salt-water marsh ecosystem. Free two-hour walking tours are offered the first and third Saturday each month, departing from Shellmaker Island at 9 am.

Newport Beach annually hosts the Newport To Ensenada International Yacht Race where participants from around the world spend two days sailing from Orange County to Mexico over the last weekend in April.

Tourists wishing to do some boating on their own, can pick from a number of charter companies including sail, power or electric boats from Blue Dolphin Sailing Club or partake in a romantic gondola ride with a singing gondolier from Adventures at Sea.

Other boating activities include whale-watching outings, sports fishing, deep-sea fishing off Catalina Island and party boating. Newport Beach is a magnet for boaters, as witnessed at many of the marina docks — bursting with impressive yachts. It is one of the largest small yacht harbours in the world.

A wonderful way to view the boating activities including the Newport To Ensenada International Yacht Race is from Lookout Point and Inspiration Point at the "Crown of the Sea" — the coastal village with small-town charm — Corona Del Mar. While there, be sure to stop by Roger's Gardens a large, lush, manicured nursery with exotic flowers, bushes and trees, where free gardening seminars and a variety of attractive events are offered all year round.

There are a number of beautiful sandy beaches including the Newport Beach Municipal Beach great for surfing, and volleyball, and Corona Del Mar Beach – perfect for snorkeling. Balboa Island offers beaches at the end of each quaint narrow street.

From Balboa Island you can drive or take a ferry across to check out the beach at Balboa Peninsula and then hang out at the historic Fun Zone featuring a merry-go-round, ferris wheel, bumper cars and bike, boat and skate rentals — a hopping place both day and night.

You can enjoy the great outdoors while shopping the quaint boutiques along the picturesque streets.

Lido Marina Village is a European style open-air marketplace with tree-lined cobblestone roads. Even the shopping mecca, Fashion Island, boasts over 200 stores and has a wonderful outdoor area to catch a few rays in between spending.

Newport Beach offers its guests a wide choice of accommodations at several price points, be it a beachfront or inland B & B, boutique hotels, long-term rental property or upscale resort.

Resort properties of note include the Newport Beach Marriott Hotel and Tennis Club, Marriott Suites, Hyatt Newporter, The Radisson Hotel, The Sutton Place Hotel and the very elegant Four Seasons.

Newport Beach is just 10 minutes from Orange County's John Wayne International Airport, named in honour of the late actor and resident of the area. Newport Beach is 80 km south of Los Angeles and 163 km north of San Diego. Conveniently located only 20 minutes from Disneyland and the new Disney's California Adventure, you can go to the beach in the morning and be at the theme parks by the afternoon.

BAYCREST PRESENTS MUNK AWARDS: Dr. Mark Loeb of the Hamilton Health Sciences Corporation (standing, second from right) and Dr. Cara Tannenbaum of McGill University Hospital Centre (standing, far right) are the recipients of the Nicholas M. and Hedy J. Munk Geriatric Award for 2000. The award is presented by Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care every two years to physicians under the age of 40 who have demonstrated special merit in the field of geriatric medicine. The award provides $10,000 to each recipient for continuing post-graduate training in the research, prevention, identification and treatment of diseases and disabilities associated with the elderly. Preference is given to physicians who choose to work in Canada or Israel. Tannenbaum plans to use her award to study geriatric research in the field of older women's health. Loeb is interested in infectious diseases affecting institutionalized older adults. This is a special year for the award. In addition to the $10,000, the Ministry of Health and Long-Term Care has contributed a matching grant in the amount of $10,000 for each recipient. Seen with the recipients are, back row, from left: Dr. Michael Gordon, vice-president of medical services, Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care; Stephen W. Herbert, Baycrest president and CEO; and Dr. Paul Munk. Front row, from left, are: Susan Munk and Olga Munk. The award was established in 1978 by Nicholas and Hedy Munk who recognized the growing need to train professionals to care for the elderly.

TORONTO — Some 13,500 cyclists and in-line skaters will take part in the 2001 Becel Ride for Heart in support of the Heart and Stroke Foundation of Ontario on June 3, at 7:15 a.m.

Participants will include three-time Olympic rowing medalist Marnie McBean and three-time Canadian figure skating champion Josée Chouinard.

The research and health promotion activities of the Heart and Stroke Foundation are vital to the well-being and longevity of all Canadians as heart disease and stroke are Canada's leading causes of death.

"This year's goal is to raise $1.5 million," says Rick Gallop, president of the Heart and Stroke Foundation of Ontario.

The Ride for Heart follows a new route that starts at the west entrance to the Canadian National Exhibition grounds, at British Columbia Drive and Lakeshore Boulevard. Cyclists will take the Gardiner Expressway to the Don Valley Parkway to complete either a 25-km or a 50-km route that loops back to the CNE. Both the Gardiner and the Don Valley will be closed to other traffic.

For the first time, in-line skaters will be able to skate the Gardiner Expressway, and three routes of 2.5-km, 5-km and 10-km are available. In-line skaters will line up for an 8:15 a.m. start time in the north lane along Lakeshore Boulevard. The startline is on British Columbia Drive.

After the ride, cyclists and skaters will enjoy a free lunch, entertainment, a massage and a visit to a health and fitness expo.

Participants can register at four check-in centres in the GTA between May 31 and June 2: Scarborough Cedarbrae Public Library, Toronto Public Library, Mississauga Civic Centre, and Mitchell Field Community Centre.

Event-day registrations will occur at the Better Living Centre on the CNE grounds between 7 a.m. and 9 a.m. for cyclists, and between 7 a.m. and 8 a.m. for in-line skaters.

The 2001 Becel Ride for Heart will take place rain or shine for cyclists; heavy rain could force the skating event to move to an indoor location.

For further information, please contact Diane Hargrave, Donna Nopper and Jennifer Asling at 416-467-9954.

100 YEARS: Pearl Steinberg, a resident of Baycrest's Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged, celebrated her 100th birthday on May 1. With her in the photo is son Dr. Murray Buchman. Steinberg has six grandchildren and 11 great-grandchildren.

Former Watchmen drummer networking in Toronto for Winnipeg bands

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Sammy Kohn is a musician of a different suit. For 12 years, Kohn has been the drummer for The Watchmen, one of Winnipeg's most successful rock bands.

Early this year, he left the group (which also consists of two other Jewish musicians: Danny Greaves and Joey Serlin) and moved to Toronto to pursue a new career in music management.

"It was a fantastic experience being with the Watchmen," Kohn says. "I got to travel the world. We made four albums, two with major Canadian labels. I fulfilled every dream I set out to achieve as a teenager. It was my college education. I have nothing but good things to say about my bandmates. I love and respect them, but I felt that it was time for a parting of the ways."

In Toronto, Kohn is staffing Studio II Entertainment Ltd.'s first office outside of Winnipeg. Studio II is a Winnipeg-based recording and artist management facility that won Studio of the Year honours at the 2000 Prairie Music Awards.

Last summer, Jason Gordon, another successful young Jewish rock musician, bought a partnership in the company which had recorded his band, Frenzee.

"Working with Studio II gives me the opportunity to refine my skills in the entertainment management side of the business," Kohn says. "My role here is to network on behalf of our clients. There is a wealth of opportunity in Toronto. I am meeting people in the industry here who will benefit our company and the Winnipeg-based bands we represent."

School board move may affect CHAT

"The Canadian Reform movement strongly supports the issue of fair funding for independent religious schools. We speak with one voice as a constituent of Canadian Jewish Congress when Ed Morgan says… that the tax credit is warmly welcomed in the Jewish community.

"We live in a diverse society where cultural differences are celebrated and the rights of minorities must be protected. Our educational system is a reflection of the larger society in which we live, and as such, must meet the needs of Ontario's faith communities," she wrote.

A suggestion to the TDSB by some school trustees to prevent independent schools from leasing facilities previously used by public schools "is thoughtless and contrary to the spirit of inclusiveness upon which Canada prides itself," Morgan said.

"This proposal is a clear expression of intolerance and flies in the face of the Ontario Human Rights Code, which prohibits discrimination on the basis of religion," he added.

Some of the schools that may be affected if the board goes ahead with its proposals include Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) and Yeshiva Yesodei Hatorah.

If the proposal is ever passed, schools looking for new space could also be affected, said UJA FEDERATION director of communications, Howard English.

'Forgive and forget,' says MVP coach Brown

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

TORONTO — Larry Brown, head coach of the National Basketball Association's (NBA) Philadelphia 76ers, feels it's time to forgive and forget, after the controversial comments made by New York Knicks stars Allan Houston and Charlie Ward a few weeks ago.

"It's disappointing," he said in an exclusive interview with The CJN before the sixth game of the quarter finals against the Toronto Raptors. "I think it's kids really not knowing what they're saying and not being well educated, but I believe they're both quality guys that just made a mistake... Sometimes you say silly things without thinking about it."

Larry Brown

Brown did not want to comment on whether NBA Commissioner David Stern's reprimand was severe enough, but he said the apology Houston and Ward were required to give is sufficient.

"As long as they're ready to say they made a mistake, I'll accept that."

Brown said he has never encountered any anti-Semitism during his career in the NBA, and that his team cares about each other and about him.

Born in Brooklyn, N.Y., and raised in Long Beach, N.Y., Brown said his grandfather was a Conservative Jew from the "old country."

"Being Jewish was important to my family and they made me understand that and be proud I was Jewish," Brown said.

He said that he was fortunate to have played in the 1961 Maccabi Games in Israel, and that seeing his grandfather's family was "kind of neat."

The issue of religion in the NBA became controversial when New York Knicks coach Jeff van Gundy said, in response to pre-game prayer sessions, that "the two worst things to happen to the NBA were God and golf," but Brown said he is not opposed to prayer before games.

"If it's not offensive to any of my players, [it's OK]. We do it as a team and we take into consideration [the fact that there are] a whole bunch of different religions, but generally everybody does it in his own way."

Brown's life philosophy and message to every child who dreams of becoming a professional athlete is to aim for excellence.

"The most important thing if you're going to play a sport or do anything, is to do the best you can. The only failure I ever see is when you don't try."

The essential thing, he said, is to study hard at school and be a good person.

In his 19 seasons coaching in the NBA Brown has compiled a .555 record, placing him 10th on the NBA's all-time victory list. In 1998-99, he became the first coach in the league's history to guide six franchises to the playoffs.

Brown was recently named NBA Coach of the Year for the 2000-2001 season.

Western wrestler grapples with disappointing result

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It still pains Seth Ross to talk about the OUAA championships. A medal was clearly within his grasp, but the Montreal native had what he readily admits was a "disappointing'" tournament against some of Canada's top freestyle wrestlers.

Fighting in the 54 kilogram weight category – "a tough weight class" – Ross finished fifth, a far cry from his usually excellent results at other top events. Earlier in the year, for example, the University of Western Ontario grappler finished second in the Ontario Junior Provincial Championships. At an open tourney at McMaster, he pushed a four-time CIAU champion to the limit before losing.

Prior to his university career, the 19-year-old was twice champion of the Greater Montreal Athletic Association and last year, as a CEGEP student at Dawson College, he won the junior provincial championship in Quebec.

Tack on a couple of wins at the Loyola Tournament and a silver at the Omnium, an open event in la belle province, and it becomes clear Ross has the stuff to excel as a wrestler.

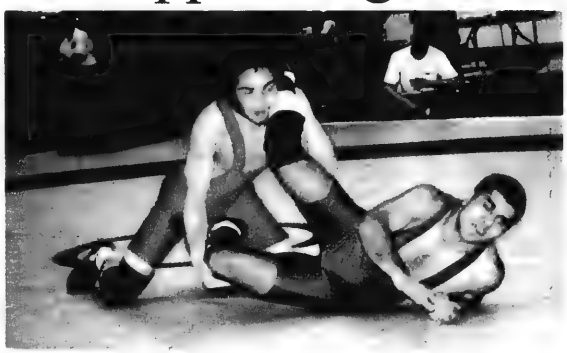
At the OUAA event, however, things did not go his way. Ross dropped a tough 5-3 decision to Nick Zuback, last year's CIAU silver medalist. He followed that up with an 11-10 loss to Amit Saini of McMaster, after seeing a 10-4 lead slip away.

"It's too painful going over it," he remarked.

Ross has some consolation, however. He expects to be part of the Canadian wrestling team at this summer's Maccabiah Games in Israel, which get under way on July 16.

"It's always been a goal for me," he said.

Ross has been around wrestling for most of his life. His father, Max, was a competitive wrestler in high school and although he didn't push him into the sport, eight years ago his brother Zack shlepped him along to a practice.



Ross (left) in a mid-match grip.

The coach at the Montreal Wrestling Club, Viktor Zilberman, a legendary judge of talent, picked Ross out of the crowd "and asked me to go to practice."

For Ross, wrestling is "a natural thing for people too short to play basketball," as well as "a controlled outlet for aggression."

A fan of other contact sports – he's also played rugby and football – Ross advanced quickly in the freestyle format.

He developed strong points in a "cross ankles" move, a ground tactic that involves forcing an opponent's ankles to cross and then twisting the foe so he rolls over for a two-point score.

He also sports "a decent shoulder throw," but his main strength is his use of tactics.

"Wrestling," he says, "is physical chess.

"I'm not as quick as other guys in my weight category. I think the key for me is being smarter than the opponent, anticipating and making up for my average quickness. Experience helps me see things coming. I'm more likely to set things up," he said.

Ross' smarts are borne out by his CEGEP marks, which were in the 93 percent range. Couple that with his extracurricular activities as president of the school, class valedictorian and editor of the yearbook, and it's understandable that Ross earned a full scholarship at Western worth $6,000 a year.

Ross is studying English and philosophy. He plans to eventually enter business school.

Joseph Edery tourney at BJCC

TORONTO — A basketball tournament in memory of Joseph Edery will take place Sunday, June 3 at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre.

Edery died April 6 of last year at the age of 17.

Money raised from the double elimination 3-on-3 tournament will go toward sending teenagers to Israel, and to other charitable causes which benefit Jewish teens.

The entry fee is $10 per person (maximum four members per team). Applications are available at their Web site, www.jembasketball.com. For information, call 905-763-7278.

Dear Karilani,

Prom is coming up and I don't have a date. All of my friends are going with dates and no one has asked me. I feel so unwanted and left out. I don't understand why no one wants to invite me to the prom. What do you think I should do?

Unwanted

About Teens

Dear Unwanted,

First things first. You have to stop being so hard on yourself. I'm sure there are people who would like to invite you to the prom but are too shy to ask. If you want to go with someone, there is no rule saying that you can't ask him. There is a stigma about girls not asking guys out, but we're living in the year 2001. Times have changed. That stigma does not apply anymore.

Also, who says you have to go with a "date?" I think you'll find you have more fun when you go with just a friend, guy or girl, or a group of friends. You can't possibly be the only one without a date. So go find that other friend who is feeling like you and go with him or her.

There is no reason that you should feel left out. I'm sure many of your friends are stuck with dates they don't even want to go with. So, really you are in a better situation than they are because you can choose who you go to the prom with. Think about who you would have the most fun with and ask him. I'm sure whoever you ask will be relieved that someone asked. You will feel really good about it afterwards.

If that person already has a date, no big deal. Just ask someone else. The key here is to go with the people you'll have the best time with. It is your prom after all.

Dear Karilani is written on a rotating basis by three high school students. The drawing is a composite. We welcome questions from our readers. Please mail, e-mail or fax them to The CJN.

OLAM

Summer 2001 / 5761

It's 10PM. Do you know where your parents are?

Inside
the Fifth Commandment:

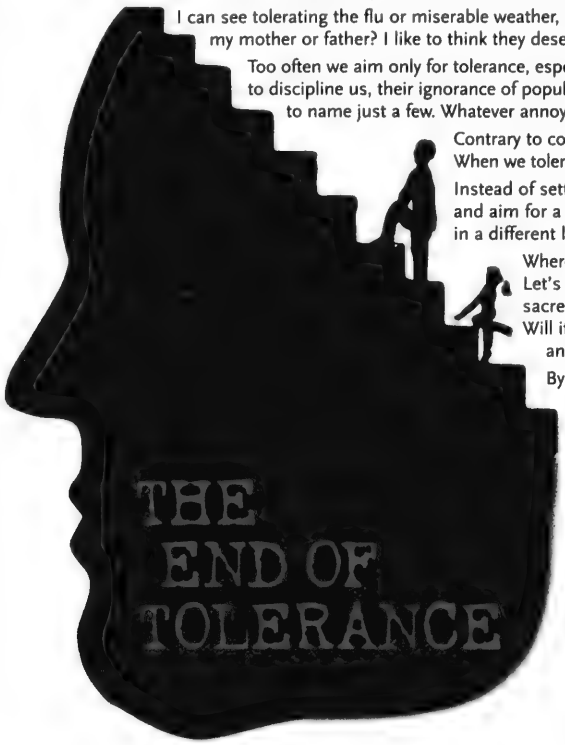
Mordecai Finley
Seymour Hersh
Michael Jackson
Michael Medved
Vanessa Paloma
Denise Rich
Shlomo Riskin
Joseph Telushkin
Abner Weiss
Richard Ziman
and many others

When it comes to relationships, tolerance is way overrated.



I can see tolerating the flu or miserable weather, but the idea of having to tolerate, for example, my mother or father? I like to think they deserve more than that.

Too often we aim only for tolerance, especially with our parents. At one point or another, we tolerate their attempts to discipline us, their ignorance of popular culture, their opinions on our career choices, their bouts of crankiness, to name just a few. Whatever annoys us, we tolerate, and that's on a good day.

Contrary to conventional wisdom, though, tolerance is not a virtue but a negative mindset. When we tolerate something, we grit our teeth and quietly endure. We survive with silence.

Instead of settling for the meager rewards of tolerance, I suggest we go for broke and aim for a timeless connection with our parents, one that lets us see the relationship in a different light.

Where do we go to create this timeless connection? Outside our comfort zone. Let's imagine, if you'll forgive me, that we're at our parents' funeral. In that sacred moment of reflection, will their character flaws still seem so annoying? Will it matter who was right and who was wrong? Will we look back, perhaps, and grieve the absence of a second chance?

By staring into the eyes of eternity, we melt the ice of tolerance and learn to embrace it all – good and bad – with an infinite heart. We transcend the thought of judgement, open our eyes, and see our parents as who they really are: eternal partners, whose destinies are forever intertwined with ours.

It's with this consciousness of infinity that we give our parents what they want most from us, which I believe is simply this: to continue the conversation. They want to know more than anything that there won't be any silence; that we won't say goodbye until the very end. Is there a simpler or deeper connection than that?

In this special issue of OLAM, we honor our parents by continuing the conversation. The Jewish tradition approaches this subject with reverence. The chapter in the Code of Jewish Law dealing with this area has no fewer than 25 specific laws, each elaborated upon by subsequent generations of scholars. So the simplicity of the Fifth Commandment – honor thy father and mother – is just the beginning. It's up to us to learn, to explore, to run with it.

We've had a lot of fun running with it. When I first mentioned to a friend that I wanted to devote a whole issue of OLAM to our parents, he kidded me that it was good for "one or two articles." As our contributing writers have shown, however, this is one conversation that will always continue.

A BRIDGE NOT TOO FA

One of the joys of living in California is that parents get to choose when to introduce their children to the reality of snow. When my twins reached the ripe old age of 8, my wife and I decided that the time had arrived. So we packed up our van and took off for a weekend away at Lake Arrowhead, about two hours outside of Los Angeles and a world away.

Once we were well on our way, Shira, my daughter, asked me to turn on the radio, and she told me which station she wanted. It was a contemporary rock station, and I'm not sure what amazed me more: that I didn't think that anything they were playing was music, or that Shira could correctly identify the singer and band for each and every song they played. On the secular side, the gap between her generation and my own is almost total.

A few more miles down the road, my wife and son had fallen asleep, leaving me and Shira alone to talk. Shira started our conversation by informing me that the boys in her class play a fantasy game in which they pretend to be kings. After explaining to her that this may be a male trait (which continues well into adulthood), I asked her if she would want to be a king or queen. "Yes", she said, "wouldn't you?"

"No," I told her. "A king has to be in public all the time. A king has to attend endless banquets, and never gets to just relax."

"Well," she informed me, "I would like to have a [illegible] myself for the display of ma[illegible]." Following, I asked Shira, "What would you do with a large sum of money if you had it?" And there the miracle of Torah broke through the generation gap:

"Abba," she said, "if I had a lot of money I would give it to tzedakah (charity). I'd build hospitals and lots of schools. And I'd make sure that poor people had enough to eat every day..." She paused, and then added, "...and I'd save enough to build myself a swimming pool to hold me and a few friends."

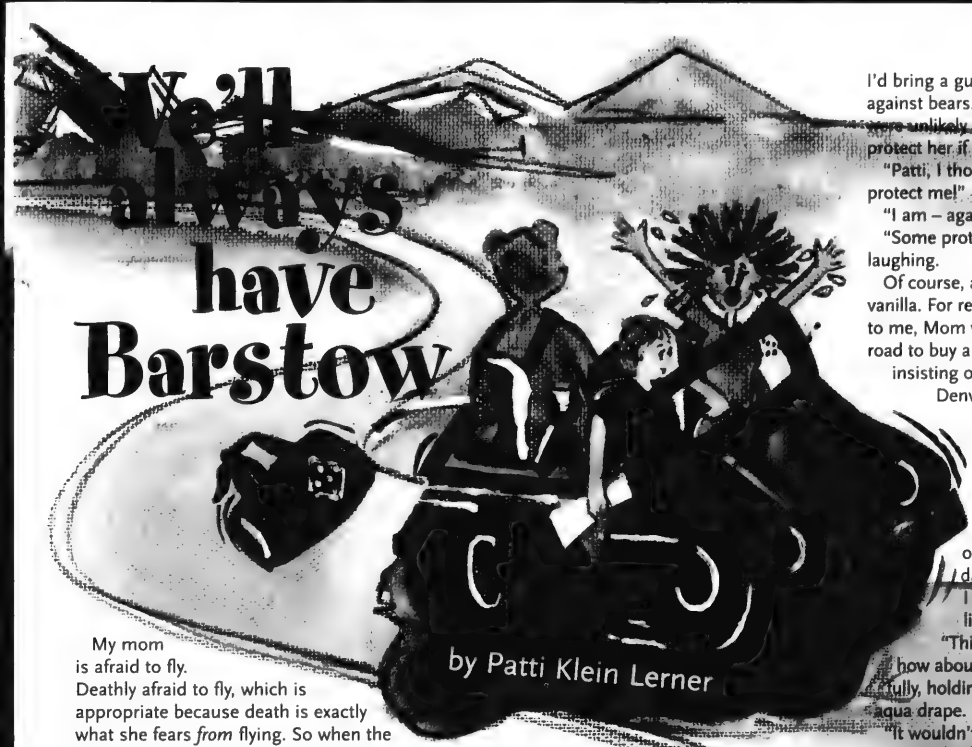
We'll always have Barstow



by Patti Klein Lerner

My mom is afraid to fly. Deathly afraid to fly, which is appropriate because death is exactly what she fears from flying. So when the invitation arrived for my cousin's wedding 1,500 miles across the country in St. Paul, I capitalized on that fear, exploiting it for my own selfish purposes. I saw it as a chance to honor my mother, something I'd never been very good at. Oh, I love my Mom and she loves me, but to call our early relationship "rocky" would be to paint too rosy a picture. The phrase "constantly at each other's throats" is more like it.

What to do to repair the breach? Why, of course, take a three-week, 3,000-mile road trip together, I decided with the special brand of clarity for which I am noted. The rest of the family would fly to the wedding, but Mom and I would drive, stopping to camp along the way, as money was tight. Also, I yearned to show Mom the splendor of our nation's rivers, mountains and forests. Heck, I yearned to spend an hour with Mom without fighting.

Mom was pushing 60 and had never camped before, but she didn't want me going alone; she'd come along to protect me. The day of the trip, I was happy to see her waiting outside her apartment, packed and ready, right on schedule. She had sewn herself three duffel bags from scratch, one each for clothes for her "top and bottom halves" and another with giant bottles of shampoo and tissues enough to last a large family through 60 bouts of the common cold. "You said I shouldn't bring big bulky suitcases," Mom said.

An hour later, with Mom repacked, we set off, happy and excited. So far so good, I thought. Then my car sputtered to a stop along a barren stretch of Interstate 15 outside Barstow. It was 5 p.m. but the temperature was 105 degrees. Now, my mom is from Minnesota, and she is not shy about letting you know how much she hates to be hot. "I can't stand this heat," she'll say when the mercury reaches 75 or so. I thought briefly about impaling myself on a cactus, deciding instead to brace myself for the inevitable verbal explosion.

> "Why, I wondered, would a woman who lives in Los Angeles want to shop for a wedding dress in Cheyenne, Wyoming?"

But lo and behold, Mom was mum. She smiled and calmly suggested walking to the nearest gas station. "What good will complaining do?" Mom asked cheerfully.

A further miracle ensued. We found a mobile car repairman in Barstow who had us back on the road within hours. By the next evening, Mom and I were sitting under the ponderosa pines at our Bryce Canyon campsite, breathing in the vanilla-scented air.

At dusk, a skunk ambled into our campsite. I jumped on the picnic table and made frantic motions with my arms. "Patti!" cried Mom, who had barely let me possess a water pistol in my youth, but who nevertheless had hoped I'd bring a gun on the trip to protect us against bears. I'd reassured her that we were unlikely to see a bear, but that I would protect her if one appeared.

"Patti, I thought you were going to protect me!"

"I am – against bears. This is a skunk."

"Some protector you are!" Mom said, laughing.

Of course, all was not pine trees and vanilla. For reasons that are still a mystery to me, Mom waited until we were on the road to buy a dress for the wedding, insisting on stopping at every mall from Denver to Minneapolis. Why, I wondered, would a woman who lives in Los Angeles want to shop for a wedding dress in Cheyenne, Wyoming? I longed to sit by gurgling rivers, watching the leaves on the trees ripple in the dappled sunlight. Instead I sat on hard mall benches listening to muzak.

"This dress looks good, Mom – how about this one?" I suggested hopefully, holding up a diaphanous aqua drape.

"It wouldn't look good on me," Mom said.

"Try it on and see," I urged.

"No!"

"Well how about this one?" I asked,

"I don't like the neckline. I want a V-neck," Mom said.

"Why didn't you buy a dress in Los Angeles?" I snarled.

"I didn't find anything that looked good. Now leave me alone!" Mom said enunciating every word through gritted teeth.

"I'm giving up my vacation time for this." I griped.

"I want to go home!" Mom trumped me.

I wish I were the kind of person who could honor my mother by smiling sweetly as she tried on every dress in America. I am, in fact, the kind of daughter who gets sucked into a screaming fight on a St. Paul street corner when the national dress dragnet still had not produced a suitable frock. Mom ended up wearing the same dress she had hauled across the country in her homemade duffel bag.

But despite the fights, by the end of the trip my now veteran camper Mom and I were undeniably closer. Together, we'd climbed mountains literally and figuratively. I would do it again tomorrow, and so would she. And in the meantime, we'll always have Barstow.

Why we choose our parents

by Michael Ozair

There is a concept in Jewish mystical thought known as gilgul, which can be translated as reincarnation. Gilgul does not necessarily mean that a soul in its entirety has been reincarnated; it may only be a nitzotz, or spark of a soul, that is reincarnated. That is to say that an individual can possess a nitzotz from the soul of someone who has lived previously. Gilgul occurs when the preceding incarnation of that soul has more to accomplish.

Rabbi Menashe Ben Israel of the 17th century writes that the word, gilgul, in Hebrew letters equals the numerical value of 72, which is also chesed, the Hebrew word for kindness. When this type of numerical connection occurs,it implies a conceptual relationship. In this case, reincarnation is seen as the ultimate kindness, in that a soul is given another chance for the refinement of its past and the spiritual advancement of its future.

Ultimately, a soul can never fail. To succeed, the soul will come back as many times as necessary to fulfill its spiritual mission. This is the view of the Kabbalists, who call the process of the soul's returning for the purpose of rectification tikkun, or repair. Sometimes it is discussed as the birur hisaron, or the clearing of a shortcoming.

If greatness is your soul's destiny, then to achieve it, it's only logical that you have a plan. Just as you would not head off to college without knowing about the school you'll be attending, souls do not randomly incarnate into this world. Rather, souls arrive with a very specific curriculum containing both goals and challenges. Your parents are a big part of that program.

It is in this respect that the Hasidic master Rabbi Yisrael of Rhizin teaches that our souls choose our parents. While the reasons for a soul's choice of parents will vary, it is always significant. Reasons can include past life relationships, or simply the conducive environment that the parents can provide for the soul in achieving its overall goal.

In a broad sense, your parents are the guarantors of your mission. How this works is different in every case. One possibility is that your parents will provide positive mentoring, as guides and as a support system. Another is the opposite – that they will model for you what you do not want to become and thus clarify the positive direction in which you need to go. The key is to know that directly or indirectly, your parents create the fire behind your passion to grow toward your spiritual advancement.

Here is an exercise to help you find out what your purpose is in this world and what role your parents are playing in it. Ask yourself these three questions:

1. Regardless of what I do for a living and what my obligations are, what is the theme that most obviously is pushing my soul forward in life, day after day?

2. What is the one theme that best describes the force pulling my soul off track day after day?

3. What role have my parents played, directly or indirectly, in developing these themes?

Why bother looking at these themes at all? Because through them we can discover the real reason we chose to come here this time around, and as an added bonus, we may discover why we chose our parents to raise us. Ultimately, the biblical commandment does not obligate us to love our parents, but to honor them. Honor in Hebrew is kibbud, which literally means "to make heavy". To honor our parents means to acknowledge them as people of tremendous worth in our pilgrimage of life. It demands effort and often requires a tolerance for emotional pain, yet it is the most dignified endeavor of an entire lifetime.

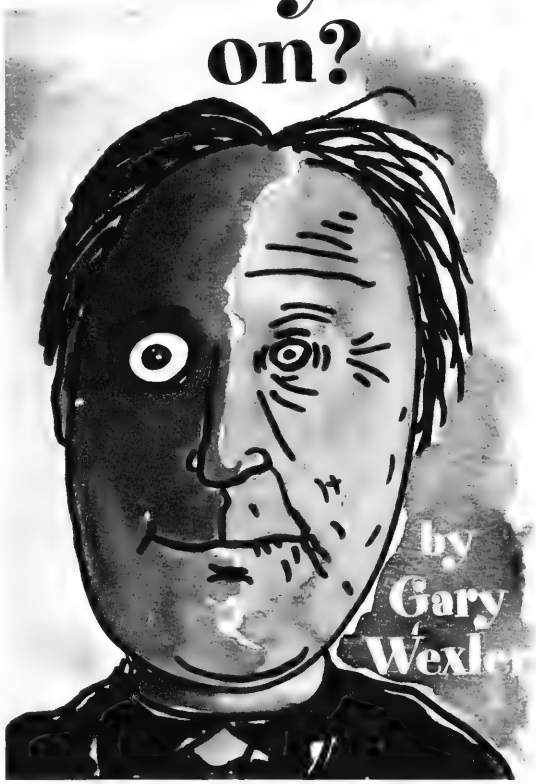
Mr. Wexler, what medications are you on?



My mother is 81. My father is 83. They've just come back from the House of Blues, where they go several times a year with a senior citizens group from Plummer Park and dance the afternoon away. A few months ago, a local news station caught them dancing and they appeared on the 6 o'clock broadcast.

My mother keeps a busy schedule. Recently, she was appointed to some official senior citizens position by the mayor of West Hollywood. She goes to an exercise class three times a week, a Yiddish class once a week and a drama class where she is always the star performer. My father's schedule is whatever my mother tells him to do. Not much has changed over the years.

Every week, it seems another of their friends has died. Each is one of five siblings. And almost all of them have died as well. They are constantly at funerals and shivas. My mother says the phone rings about 50 percent less than it used to. Yet they continue to remanufacture a social circle, going to plays, movies and out to dinner, and travelling. Last year, they took a Yiddish-speaking cruise to the Caribbean. Three weeks ago, my cousin's daughters came in from Chicago and my mother made dinner for 20 people. On Friday nights after Shabbat dinner, my father still lines everyone up – me, my kids, my brother – to give us massages. They're far better than what I get for $60 at the massage place on Ventura Boulevard.

I am in awe of my parents at this point in their lives. They make great old people. I never felt that way about them as middle-aged people. Like most kids, I didn't think my parents were so great. I only saw what was wrong. At the age of 49, soon to be 50, I now want to be just like them. I should live so long.

Last month, my father had a cough and a sore throat. My brother took him to Kaiser because my mother insisted he be seen by a doctor. My father hates doctors and never goes. My mother is at Kaiser almost every day, though there is nothing wrong with her. So the doctor examines my father and says to him, "Mr. Wexler, what medications are you on?"

"What?" my father answers.

The doctor repeats his question.

My father replies, "I don't take any medicines."

The doctor looks at my father's chart. "Mr. Wexler, you are 83 years old."

My father looks at him, "So?"

"What medications are you on?"

"Nothing," my father says with intolerance.

"Let me get this straight," the doctor says. "You are 83 and you take no medication."

"Correct."

"I've never seen this before. Go home. You only have a cold."

My mother seemed to be satisfied.

Yet with all their activity, my parents are obsessed with death. It's all around them. Every week, after they attend their weekly funeral, they call me to come over to rehearse their death plans. "In case anything should ever happen to us, you know where the key is to the vault. Make sure you go there immediately and take out the...."

"Yeah, yeah, yeah, Mom."

"And the funeral plans are paid for with Kaplin at the mortuary. We took care of that years ago."

For two decades I have heard about the funeral plans with Kaplin at the mortuary. Kaplin and the mortuary are both spoken about in hushed reverance as if he is the hovering Angel of Death.

Last week, my mother calls me in a complete panic. They were dancing at the park ... "Boy, you should see those Russians dance" ... and a woman comes to her and says, "Did you hear about Kaplin?"

"No," my mother gasps, believing she is about to hear that Kaplin died.

"He disappeared with hundreds of thousands of dollars in people's funeral monies."

My mother rushes my father out of the park and calls me at work to tell me the news. "You have to come over and bring the envelope with all the funeral plans. Kaplin's disappeared with the money!"

"What money?" I ask.

"The funeral money which we paid him 20 years ago."

I start to laugh. My mother starts to yell.

"What do you think is so funny?" She raises her voice even louder.

We get into this squabble. I am once again 15 years old. Yet, I suddenly realize, she is 81.

I stop. I think. I say to myself, "You are the luckiest guy on earth. You're almost 50 and your parents are still alive, healthy and active. They don't come to you for a thing. They are totally independent. They drive. They go out. They have friends. Their minds and bodies are totally intact. Don't get her upset, you idiot."

I apologize. That night I bring over the funeral plans. I look at my parents. They are 81 and 83 years old. Yet, I cannot imagine that someday, my brother and I will have to use what is in that envelope.

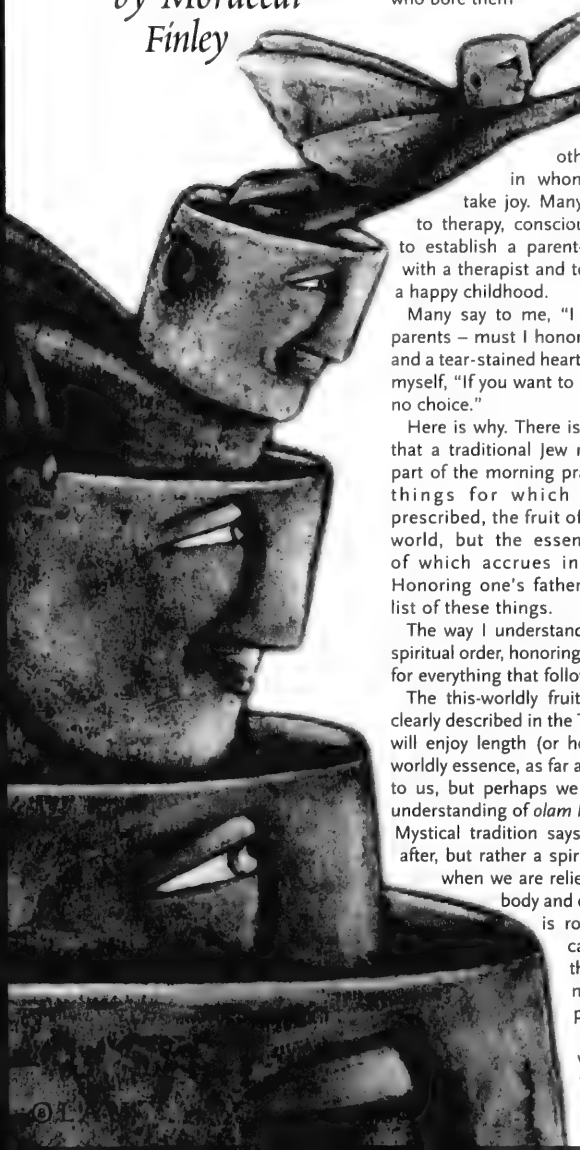
Meet the (deeper) parents

by Mordecai Finley



Our oldest daughter Shulamit, now 7, began a little game with me a few years ago. "Who is your daddy?" I asked her, lifting her up. She smiled in a sure and knowing way and said, "I have two fathers – you and God." The game went on – she soon had two additional parents, Adam and Eve, and as she learned more, Abraham and Sarah were added. When she is older, and I explain that in the kabbalah, one aspect of the inner life of God is divided into two energies, the masculine and the feminine – and called abba (Dad) and ima (Mom) – I am sure she will be delighted.

If I were to ask her the meaning of "Honor your parents," she would likely ask, "Which ones?"

Which ones, indeed. Many people with whom I have worked in spiritual counseling rue the parents who bore them and have no other parents in whom they can take joy. Many people go to therapy, consciously or not, to establish a parent-child bond with a therapist and to try, once again, to have a happy childhood.

> "try asking yourself: When your parents bore you, and when they looked at you for the first time, do you think their plan was to hurt you?"

Many say to me, "I did not have honorable parents – must I honor them?" I detect a tragic and a tear-stained heart, and reply, heavy-hearted myself, "If you want to get on with life, you have no choice."

Here is why. There is a section in the Talmud that a traditional Jew recites every morning as part of the morning prayers. It says, "There are things for which no set measure is prescribed, the fruit of which you enjoy in this world, but the essence (keren, in Hebrew) of which accrues in the world to come." Honoring one's father and mother heads the list of these things.

The way I understand this is that in a certain spiritual order, honoring parents is the foundation for everything that follows.

The this-worldly fruit of honoring parents is clearly described in the Ten Commandments: you will enjoy length (or health) of days. The next-worldly essence, as far as I know, is not explained to us, but perhaps we can detect it in a fuller understanding of olam ha-ba, the world to come. Mystical tradition says that this is not a time after, but rather a spiritual dimension we enter when we are relieved of the constraints of body and ego, a consciousness that is rooted in the soul. If you can honor your parents, then your soul-consciousness will carry you to paradise today.

But for those who have very bad parents, how can this be accomplished? Such people may never have learned to feel safe or whole. They often possess an underlying sense of victimhood, and with it an underlying hostility. Told to forgive, they say, "I can't – I am too hurt," or "Too angry."

If this sounds like you, try asking yourself: When your parents bore you, and when they looked at you for the first time, do you think their plan was to hurt you? Undoubtedly they became a mix of what they learned growing up and the holy energy of archetypal parents struggling to get through. Imagine that every parent is constructed of experience plus the divine masculine and feminine energy, and the ideal wholeness of Adam and Eve, and the covenantal love of Abraham and Sarah.

Understand the idiosyncracies of your parents. Odd as this may sound, the negative things parents do to their children are rarely personal; when we hurt those whom we love, it is usually our particular form of craziness coming out – a ruach shtoot, as Jewish tradition calls it. Your parents may not even know what they are (or were) doing.

Understand that after a certain point, choosing to stay angry is a spiritual choice. Emotions don't often feel like choices until we access the world of the soul – a realm deeper than our emotions – but from the soul's perspective we can see that emotions don't have a natural, ineluctable form. We can shape them.

Find a tactical way to love, forgive and honor your parents. Sometimes it needs to be at a distance. Full reconciliation may not be possible. But do something, and be sure it is not your own pride or stubbornness getting in the way.

Then, finally, find your deeper parents. Imagine Abraham and Sarah rejoicing to know that their work in founding the Jewish people finds fruition in you. Imagine the full human potential of Adam and Eve in the garden. They know that their way back to the garden is through you; if you live a life of moral dignity and spiritual wholeness, you heal them. Their hope is in you.

Imagine the divine Ima and Abba pulsing through you, urging you toward balance, joy and holiness.

Honoring parents means honoring all these parents, and in honoring all of them, learning to honor the temporal ones we are sometimes stuck with. It also means making it as easy as we can for our kids to honor us, by fortifying our own bridges to those other, holy parents. Thus may we provide childhoods of safe love, unswerving morality, the experience of joy and the knowledge of the sacred.

BY MICHAEL JACKSON

When I look back on my childhood, it is not an idyllic landscape of memories. My relationship with my father was strained, and my childhood was an emotionally difficult time for me. I began performing when I was five years old, and my father – a tough man – pushed my brothers and me hard, from the earliest age, to be the best performers we could be.

Although we all worked hard to perform, he never really complimented me. If I did a great show, he would tell me it was a good show. And if I did an OK show, he didn't say anything at all. He seemed intent, above all else, on making us a commercial success. And at that he was more than adept. My father was a managerial genius, and my brothers and I owe our professional success, in no small measure, to the forceful way he pushed us. He trained me as a showman, and under his guidance I couldn't miss a step.

Those of you who are familiar with the Jackson Five know that since I began performing at that tender age I haven't stopped dancing or singing. But while performing and making music undoubtedly remain among my greatest joys, when I was young I wanted more than anything else to be a typical little boy. I wanted to build tree houses, have water balloon fights and play hide-n-seek with my friends. But fate had it otherwise, and all I could do was envy the laughter and playtime that seemed to be going on all around me.

There was no respite from my professional life. But on Sundays I would go "Pioneering", the term used for the missionary work that Jehovah's Witnesses do. It was then that I was able to see the magic of other people's childhood.

Since I was already a celebrity, I had to don a disguise of fat suit, wig, beard and glasses, and we would spend the day in the suburbs of Southern California, going door-to-door or making the rounds of shopping malls, distributing our Watchtower magazine. I loved to set foot in all those regular suburban houses and catch sight of the shag rugs and La-Z-Boy armchairs, kids playing Monopoly and grandmas babysitting and all those wonderful, ordinary and starry scenes of everyday life. Many, I know, would argue that these things are no big deal. But to me they were mesmerizing – because they symbolized, to me, a home life that I seemed to be missing.

My father was not openly affectionate with us, but he would show his love in different ways. I remember once when I was about four years old, we were at a little carnival and he picked me up and put me on a pony. It was a tiny gesture, probably something he forgot five minutes later. But because of that one moment, I have this special place in my heart for him. Because that's how kids are, the little things mean so much to them and for me, that one moment meant everything. It was a gesture that showed his caring, and his love. I only experienced it that one time, but it made me feel really good, about him and the world.

And I have other memories too, of other gestures, however imperfect, that showed his love for us. When I was a kid, I had a real sweet tooth – we all did. I loved eating glazed doughnuts, and my father knew that. So every few weeks I would come downstairs in the morning and there on the kitchen counter was a bag of glazed doughnuts – no note, no explanation, just the doughnuts. It was like a fairy godmother had visited our kitchen. It was like Santa Claus. Sometimes, I would think about staying up late so I could see him leave them there, but as with Santa Claus, I didn't want to ruin the magic, for fear that he would never do it again.

I think now that my father had to leave the doughnuts secretly at night so that no one would catch him with his guard down. He was scared of human emotion, he didn't understand it, or know how to deal with it. But, he did know doughnuts.

And when I allow the floodgates to open up, there are other memories that come rushing back, memories of other tiny gestures, however imperfect, that showed that he did what he could.

With hindsight and maturity, I have come to see that even my father's harshness was a kind of love. An imperfect love, sure, but love nonetheless. He pushed me because he loved me. He pushed me because he wanted me to have more than he EVER had, and he wanted my life to be better than his EVER was.

It has taken me a long time to realize this, but now I feel the resentments of my childhood are finally being put to rest. My bitterness has been replaced by blessing, and in place of my anger, I have found absolution. And with this knowledge, that my father loved his children, I have found peace.

Michael Jackson has been performing since the age of 5 and, in his record-breaking career, has been the recipient of nearly every award offered by the music and video industries. The Millennium edition of The Guinness Book of World Records rated him as the the pop star who supports the most charities. Michael's next album is due out later this year.

The Fifth Commandment, "Honor your father and mother," is so famous that people rarely stop to consider two odd things about it. First is its presence in the Torah's earliest legal code. New religions usually are interested in alienating children from parents, not in strengthening their relationship.

©LAM

Since parents usually try to influence children to conduct their lives with value systems similar to their own, new religious groups, in order to succeed, usually feel that they must wean children away from their parents. Contemporary cults, for example, often attempt to drive a wedge between parents and children. That is why the Torah's mandating the obligation to honor one's parents in its first legal document seems counterintuitive. At a lecture, a listener once challenged my thinking: "Isn't it true," he said, "that God's first commandment to Abraham was to leave his father's home?" I responded,

"It is true. Only he was 75 already; he was entitled." (See Genesis 12:3)

Why then did Judaism, unlike most new religions, insist on the enduring importance of the parent/child relationship? While new religions fear that loyalty to parents will lead to alienation from the religious group, the Hebrew Bible felt that common decency and gratitude obligated a child to remain close to his parents.

Yet despite Jewish law's insistence on honoring one's parents, it insists with equal vehemence that a child should not compromise control of his conscience to his parents. A Talmudic passage rules that, if a father instructs a child to give him a lost object the child has found instead of returning it to its owner, the child should refuse. Since the Bible legislates that lost items must be returned to their owners, a parent does not have the right to insist that the child violate God's law, one which the parent also is obligated to observe. Yet even when refusing the parent's command, Jewish law instructs the child not to break off contact with the parent, and to act respectfully toward him or her. In short, treat your parents with respect even when they are doing something not good; just don't become not good yourself.

"The second surprising feature of the Fifth Commandment is its insistence that we owe our parents honor, while saying nothing about loving them."

The second surprising feature of the Fifth Commandment is its insistence that we owe our parents honor, while saying nothing about loving them. It is not as if the Torah is reluctant to command love: "Love your neighbor as yourself" (Leviticus 19:18); "And you shall love the Lord your God" (Deuteronomy 6:5); "You shall love the stranger [i.e., the non-Jew who lives among you]" (Leviticus 19:34). Why then are we not commanded to love our parents?

One possibility is that parents are included in the command to "Love your neighbor as yourself"; since they too are your "neighbors", you are commanded to love them. But I think the real reason is that the Torah realized that it is harder to command love in a relationship as intimate as that between children and parents; either the love is present or it isn't. In addition, many children, much as they might love their parents most of the time, go through periods of estrangement from them. Thus, what the Torah is offering us is a guideline for behavior even during those periods when we might not be feeling loving toward our parents. Even at those times when we feel our parents have not been fair to us, or even when we have seen them do something we regard as wrong, we are still obligated to honor them. (However, in instances of parents who have physically or sexually abused their children, I believe that children do not owe the parents respect, or anything else for that matter.) This obligation is important to emphasize, since I know of children who, during moments of anger, say awful things to their parents, such as "I wish I had decent parents, not parents like you," or "I hate you." What makes such statements or disrespectful behavior so awful? In addition to being cruel, these are acts of gross ingratitude.

I have a friend who grew up harboring deep resentment toward his parents. He often lamented, "They never really cared about me. They had little time for me, they didn't take my ideas seriously, and they were always getting angry at me."

But one day, his attitude started to soften. It all happened when he became a parent, and found himself getting up at 3 a.m. to bring a bottle to his crying daughter. "I realized then that my parents probably devoted far more hours to me than I had ever previously thought. The fact that I survived to my teenage years with all my fingers and toes intact means that they were watching me far more than I realized. And how could I not be profoundly grateful for that?"

So I would suggest that with all the complex emotions you might feel toward your parents (without such feelings, psychologists would probably lose half their patients), remember to honor them. Three important ways to do so: express gratitude, devote time to them (for example, through regular, frequent phone calls) and when you genuinely feel it, express the love you are feeling. Plenty of adult children don't do this; they make their parents aware of all that the parents did that they regard as wrong, while rarely, if ever, mentioning all that the parents did that was right.

Lewis Grizzard, in My Daddy Was a Pistol, and I'm a Son of a Gun, recalls going through his father's few possessions at the hospital where he had died. In his father's coat, Grizzard found a letter that his father evidently had been carrying around for a long time: "It was a letter from me. I had written it six months before. It was short, maybe a page, typewritten. Down at the end, I had given him some grief about straightening out his life. I told him I would have to think twice about inviting him to my house again if he didn't promise he wouldn't show up drinking. I'd just signed my name. I didn't say 'love' or anything. I had just signed my bloody name like I was a real hardass. I still wonder why he carried such a letter around with him for so long. Maybe he kept it as a reminder to do better. I don't know. Maybe he kept it to remind himself his only son was turning on him. Whatever, I never forgave myself for that letter. I can't get it out of my head that he died not knowing how much I loved him."

The Place

by David Sacks

Anyone who's lost a parent, or any loved one, goes through the inevitable process of wondering whether they've been abandoned by G-d.

Part of an answer comes in the words of consolation we say to someone in mourning. "May G-d console you among the other mourners of Zion and Jerusalem."

Interestingly, the Hebrew word used for G-d here, HaMakom, literally means "The Place." May "The Place" reach out to console us. There are many different names for God in Jewish prayer and Torah, each of them opening our eyes to a different aspect of His light and reality. But the name HaMakom, "The Place"– or perhaps better, "The Omnipresent One" – is rarely used. Why this special name at this most sensitive time?

Before we can answer, let's look at another expression of the concept of place in Jewish mourning. Ordinarily, we're supposed to have a set place where we pray, either in our home or in shul – our makom kavuah. According to Jewish law, during the 12 months of mourning a person must move this place about eight feet from the usual place of prayer. The simple explanation is that in our lives we've experienced a sense of dislocation and this is reflected in our choice of a place of prayer. Maybe it reflects dislocation in our relationship with G-d, as well.

But there's an interesting twist in this halacha, which is that on Shabbos, we return to our regular place. This has to do with the special blessing of the day. The Ishbitzer Rebbe asks what the difference is between simcha (joy) and oneg (bliss). "Simcha," he says, "is when G-d gives you something you didn't have before, but oneg is when G-d shows you what you've had all along." Shabbos is a time of oneg, when G-d lifts us out of the work-a-day week and gives us a heavenly perspective. On Shabbos we can experience oneness between the physical and the material, and the seamless flow that connects them. Thus un-dislocated, we can return to our usual seat in the synagogue.

Rebbe Nachman of Bratslav ties together these various strands with regard to the parting of the soul. Says Rebbe Nachman: "Most people think that when someone dies, he goes from one room to another. But I say when someone dies, he goes from one side of the room to the other side of the same room."

In other words, people may think of this world and the next as two discrete entities, two worlds that are next to each other but otherwise have nothing in common. But the reality is that the universe is one room, not two. And that same Divine energy that enlivens the upper spheres exists below here, albeit in a different external form. Imagine a never-ending road. This is life. At a certain point, we may shed our bodies, but the journey along that same road continues; in fact, we don't even miss a step.

Thus, as much as we think that there's a separation between our departed parent and us, or (worse) between G-d and us, it's really not the case. So G-d consoles us by saying, "I am the Place, so wherever you go and whatever you feel, I am with you." The mourner sees this continuum most clearly on Shabbos, but it is always there.

I once heard Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach comfort someone who had lost her mother. "Now you're closer to your mother than ever," he said. "Because it used to be when you wanted to be with her, you'd have to call her, or she'd call you. But now, the truth is that wherever you go, she's right there with you." And how close is that? According to our Sages, "closer than two hairs on a person's head." This world and the next are completely intertwined.

In those same words of consolation, the word used for "you" – "May God console you among the other mourners of Zion..."– is etchem the plural form. Why? According to the Baal Shem Tov, it's because the departed soul needs to be comforted along with the mourner. But the departed are with G-d in the Garden of Eden! Why do they need comforting? Because they're sad that we're sad. Unbelievable.

Thus the Omnipresent One is with each of us in every realm, and we are all a hair's breadth from one another, across time and in every place. The more we understand this, the more we'll be comforted with all the mourners, living and dead.

And now we see how G-d consoles us with the name HaMakom. Contained in that name is the realization that wherever we go, and whatever we're experiencing, He is with us. And this is the ultimate comfort for all the mourners of Zion and Jerusalem.

In the mystical tradition of Isaac Luria, the great Tsfat Kabbalist, the erotic, the holy and the elder are of the same essential quality. Of course, erotic in this context refers not to the sexual but to the state of being of which sexuality is only one manifestation. This state is referred to in Hebrew as the state of Zohar, or in English as the state of Eros.

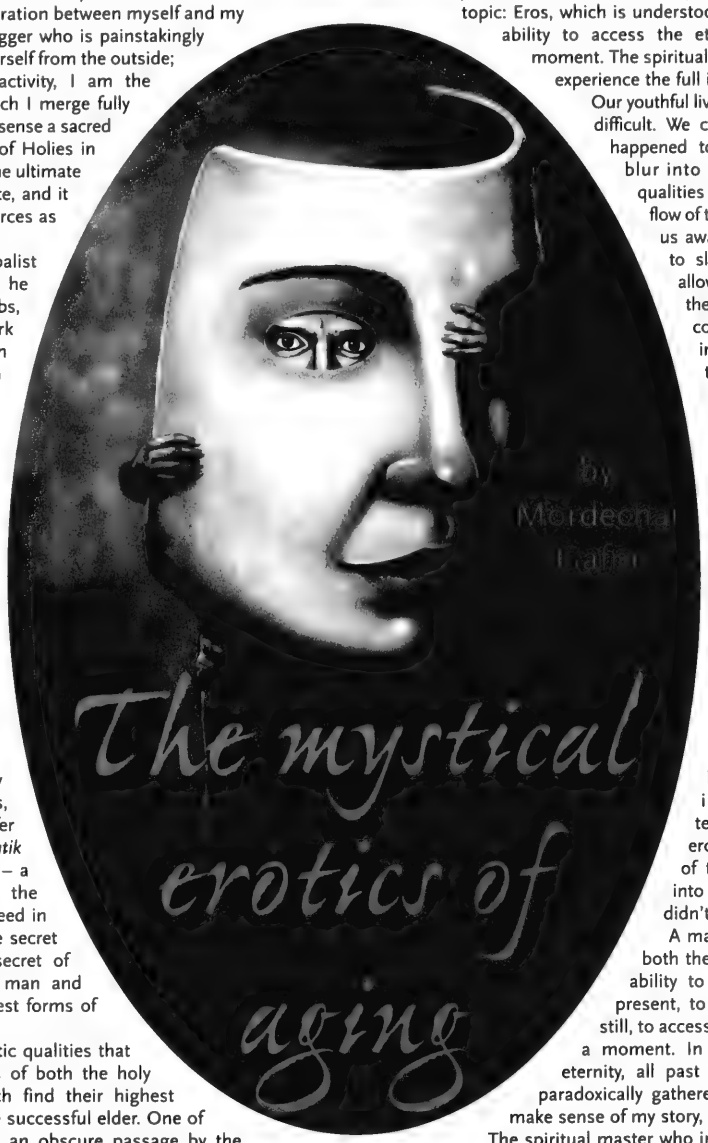
To be erotically engaged is to be holy on the inside. On the inside means that there is no separation between myself and my action. I am no longer a jogger who is painstakingly running, watching him or herself from the outside; I have merged with my activity, I am the running. Any activity in which I merge fully with the experience is in this sense a sacred and "erotic" act. The Holy of Holies in the Temple in Jerusalem is the ultimate religious symbol of this state, and it is referred to in mystical sources as "the inside of the inside."

In this context, the Kabbalist Nachmanides solves what he calls the mystery of the cherubs, who stood above the Ark in the Holy of Holies in Jerusalem. Entwined in intimate embrace, they were a surprising image to find at the fulcrum of the sacred. But by being there, Nachmanides explains, they taught us that redeemed sensuality models the holy. The goal of holiness is to expand the realm of erotic engagement from the sexual to all facets of life, whether exercise, prayer, professional involvement or conversation.

According to that same Kabbalistic tradition, the ultimate role models for this holy Eros are not baby cherubs or youthful adults, but the elderly. Mystics refer to the Holy of Holies as atik yomin, the ancient of days – a mystical appellation for the archetype of the elder. Indeed in mystical understanding, the secret of the cherubs and the secret of aging are one. The aged man and woman personify the deepest forms of redeemed Eros.

There are 10 distinct erotic qualities that are primary characteristics of both the holy and the sexual, and which find their highest expression in the life of the successful elder. One of these is best explained in an obscure passage by the Chasidic master Mordechai Lainer, the Rebbe of Ishbitz.

Rabbi Lainer offers a unique interpretation of the Talmud's assertion that Jacob never died. In his view, it means that Jacob never experienced the horror of death, for the pain of death stems from the sharp transition it marks from fleeting temporality to the infinity of eternity. Jacob never underwent this painful transition, for he was already able to taste eternity in his old age. Successful old age, implies Lainer, is the time when we are able to experience the eternity that resides in a moment.



At this point Lainer asks a seemingly unrelated question. Why does the very next passage in the Talmud – after the claim that Jacob never died – discuss Rahav, the famous harlot from the time of Joshua? The passage states that anyone who knew (carnally) Rahav, even if it was many years past, would have an involuntary emission at the mere conjuring of her name.

His implicit answer: because both passages are about the same topic: Eros, which is understood by the text to mean the ability to access the eternity that resides in a moment. The spiritual work of life is to be able to experience the full infinity of every moment.

Our youthful lives make this extraordinarily difficult. We can barely remember what happened to us yesterday; moments blur into each other, their unique qualities obfuscated by the torrential flow of time that threatens to sweep us away. But old age is intended to slow the flow of time and allow us to go back and collect the moments of our past, to connect the dots of our lives in order to form a picture that we can understand.

Before reaching our later years, however, there is one experience that models for us while we are young the spiritual living that is our goal: sexuality. This is virtually the only arena in which, for all of us, time stands still. Eternity is present in the fleeting moment.

Moreover, the moment does not get lost. If someone knew Rahav once, he can recover the eternity and glory of that moment even many years later. The Talmudic text, illuminated by Lainer, teaches that in old age, the erotic shatters the boundaries of the sexual and spills over into every facet of being. Jacob didn't even have to "die."

A major characteristic, then, of both the erotic and the holy is the ability to be fully available to the present, to experience time standing still, to access the eternity that resides in a moment. In that moment of present eternity, all past and future moments are paradoxically gathered as well. I can begin to make sense of my story, the sacred text of my days.

The spiritual master who invites us to the experience of eternity is none other than the atik yomin, the ancient of days, the elder – who according to mystical tradition is the symbol of the Holy of Holies, seat of sacred Eros, where the two cherubs lock in intimate embrace.

A love letter to my in-laws

by Shlomo Riskin

This past August, my wife and I (mostly my wife) successfully transported my 91-year-old father-in-law and 81-year-old mother-in-law from Palm Beach and Central Park South to an extension of our home in Efrat, Israel. Four weeks later, the El Aksa intifada broke out – and Efrat, which borders on Gilo on one side and on Bethlehem on the other, was near the eye of the storm. On the Friday evening before Yom Kippur, with some 20 people gathered around the Sabbath dinner table, we heard the unmistakable sound of gunshots. I whispered to my wife, "I know your parents are very tuned in, but I hope no one will say anything and perhaps they'll think it's firecrackers."

As if on cue, my mother-in-law stood up and looked at me accusingly, but with an unmistakable twinkle in her eye (my mother-in-law has more than a few thespian genes). "Is this your idea of the ultimate mother-in-law joke, bringing us here at the outbreak of war?" Then she turned to the dinner guests: "But no matter what happens, this is where we want to be – with our children, grandchildren and 10 great-grandchildren." She pointed to my wife and me. "They rescued us from America. This is our home, this is where we want to be. And this is where we should be."

And so my in-laws have continued to fearlessly go about their business; my father-in-law, having mastered the internet since his aliyah, searching and saving for me (his internet-ignorant son-in-law) and for his coterie of e-mail correspondents all of the important pro-Israel articles and editorials worldwide, and my mother-in-law joining my wife in various charitable endeavors, as well as extended family shopping, engineering and first-aid.

Our family beginnings, however, could hardly have presaged their enjoying such productive golden years in the "settlement" city of Efrat. Neither my father-in-law nor my mother-in-law grew up in a religiously observant or even Zionist family; indeed, my mother-in-law is a fifth-generation American originally from Davenport, Iowa, in whose family circulated a "rumor" that a great-grandmother had fasted on Yom Kippur.

My wife, their only child, was sent to the prestigious and pluralistic United Nations International School in New York. After a school-sponsored European summer trip that included Germany, she asked to spend the following summer in Israel. My mother-in-law then entered a synagogue for the first time in her life, the Jewish Center of Forest Hills, to inquire of the Executive Director about tours to Israel for teenagers. "Is your daughter observant?" she was asked. My mother-in-law interpreted "observant" to mean insightful, perspicacious. "My daughter is very observant!" she replied, and Vicky was sent on an Orthodox tour to Israel run by Yeshiva University and led by Victor and Hanya Geller.

And so, my wife became observant. The winter following the tour she spent every Sabbath with the Gellers, and the following summer she returned to Israel and attended one of my lectures, and we fell in love. My soon-to-be in-laws must have been fairly devastated. Although they were outwardly supportive of our relationship – graciousness had been built into each of their personalities at birth – their daughter was only 16 (though already at Barnard), and the profession of the Orthodox rabbinate in the early '60s could hardly support their daughter in the style they would have wanted for her. Moreover, we were about to cast in the eternal stone of a wedding ring a bizarre and outmoded lifestyle that they had hoped would be but a passing phase in the life of their beautiful, brilliant and capable daughter.

They did suggest that we see a psychiatrist, and we agreed to do so. They also insisted that we wait to get married until Vicky turned 18, and that she finish Barnard – which she did, wheeling our first-born daughter Batya to her graduation. But except for these three modest requests, they whole-heartedly, uncriticizingly and lovingly supported and strengthened every stage of our familial and professional development, even including our aliyah to Israel. And all of this despite the tremendous differences in our religious lifestyles and backgrounds.

Today in Efrat my in-laws can definitely be said to be living the lives of observant Jewish Zionists. From that perspective, we, our children and our grandchildren have helped influence and raise them. But they have raised us as well, and taught us far more. They have taught us to respect and learn from those who are different from us, even if they are our children. They have taught us to be open and supportive of our children, even if we disagree with their existential and practical choices. And they have taught us that special people have the capacity to continue to learn and grow and change even beyond the age of 80 and 90 – and, please God, may they continue to do so in good health even beyond the age of 100.

Rabbi Shlomo Riskin is the founder and Chancellor of Ohr Torah Stone Institutions of Israel, and is also the Chief Rabbi of Efrat, Israel. He is the founding rabbi of Lincoln Square Synagogue in Manhattan.

I'm a relic of a world that doesn't exist – my parents fled their ghettos in Eastern Europe before the First World War and came by steerage to Chicago and a new life. Isidore and Dorothy Hersh often spoke Yiddish at home to each other, especially when there was something the children were not to hear, and my Dad, who owned a small dry cleaning store, was a faithful reader of the daily Forward.

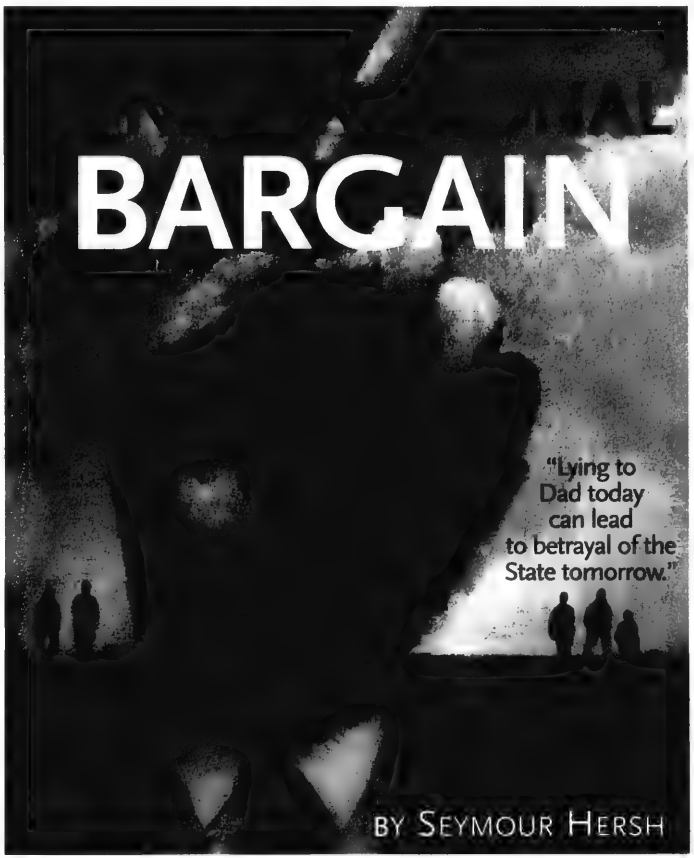
I grew up with the notion of presidential good – the belief that the men running our nation were honorable and trustworthy. Franklin Delano Roosevelt was a god, and Harry Truman became one. The authority of the president and my father were co-mingled in my mind. I still remember, with reddening shame, the white lie I told my father as a teenager about a small dent I'd put in his car. I was caught, of course, and lied as long as I could. It was more than just being caught – there was a sense that I'd failed a crucial test of citizenship, or manhood. Lying to Dad today can lead to betrayal of the State tomorrow.

I went to the local public school – where else? – and, after graduating from public high school, moved on without a second thought to the equivalent of a public junior college in Chicago. It was free. A professor there saw something in me and persuaded me that I had to transfer to the University of Chicago. My father had passed away by then, but somehow my mother managed to scrape together the $130 per quarter tuition. I helped pay my way by working 30 hours a week. I graduated in 1958 with a degree in history, and flung myself into the world.

I had no contacts, no rich uncles, no well-placed cousins, no money, and no immediate prospects. I vividly remember my first job as a college graduate – as a clerk in a liquor store. In 1969, after a fitful few years as a police reporter, wire service reporter and freelance Washington journalist, I wrote a series of articles about an atrocity in South Vietnam and, with a colleague, distributed them willy-nilly to newspapers. I was celebrated for my articles and won most of the major journalism prizes that year – for writing a story that flew in the face of President Richard Nixon's policy. Only in America. A nondescript child of immigrants, 11 nondescript years after getting out of college, earns fame, fortune and glory by sticking two fingers in the eye of an American president. What a bargain.

The deal has soured.

The children, and parents, of today have a different view of their leaders, and they're not wrong. Presidents don't tell the truth, and their national security advisors can no longer distinguish their propaganda from their reality. Everyone spins everyone else.



Our leaders have no moral force at all – in fact, they far too often have been a force for immorality or realpolitik. Might makes right. We bomb others because we have the bombs and they don't. Today's much heralded military doctrine – Overwhelming Force – is just another way of saying that we only fight when we cannot possibly be defeated.

There is a terrible irony in this, and a terrible loss. We, as parents and as children, still understand – as my father did – that our personal and family life must revolve around integrity and trust. We don't lie to our children and they are expected to tell us the truth – when it matters. Life would be insufferable, we also know, without total trust in our partners.

So here's the deal. We have these men – these presidents and national security advisers, these Nixons and Kissingers and Clintons – who have the right to take our children and train them in the art of killing, and being killed, in the name of America and we don't hold them to the same standards we insist upon in our family life. We don't insist that they stop the lies and propaganda. We accept without complaint the fact that our leaders tell lies and put political and personal needs before those of the citizenry. It's a necessary cost of the commonweal, we say. We shrug our shoulders or make feeble jokes about a president who fabricates an enemy attack, as in the Gulf of Tonkin, or undermines the sanctity of the electoral process, as in Watergate, or wags his finger in our face as he misrepresents his abusive relationship with an intern.

Daniel Ellsberg, the onetime Marine who turned against the Vietnam War and made public the Pentagon Papers in 1971, once told me what I took to be a seminal story about the new American values. He was working in the Johnson Administration for John McNaughton, a senior Pentagon official who played a key role on Vietnam issues. Ellsberg told his boss about a lunch he'd had with a State Department official who praised McNaughton for being open and straightforward. "I want you to know I defended your honor," Ellsberg recalled telling McNaughton. "I told him you were the most devious man I knew. He laughed and said, 'Thank you.'"

It's time to change our national bargain.

TRAVELING

I had left the house angry. The only problem with leaving a place in such a manner is that it oftentimes leaves one unprepared for what lies ahead. What lay ahead was a cross-country bus ride without so much as a magazine to keep my attention from wandering back to the same unpleasant thought: I had left the house angry.

So there I was, aloft on my diesel fuel-soaked magic carpet, sitting as far away from the bathroom as I could, alone for the first time in as long as I could remember, with only my own mind for company. It was going to be a long trip.

Hour one, stared out the window. Hour two, stared at my reflection staring out the window. Hour three, checked out the guy across from me and tried to figure out what his deal was. He had to be at least 65. Unshaven. Probably unshowered, too. Could be a deranged psycho killer. But I wouldn't judge a book by my paranoia. Maybe he was his generation's Howard Hughes. Hour four, I became so bored I attempted to find out.

"Going all the way to Vegas?" I asked, trying to sound like I had made the trip many times before.

"No. Wichita." His voice was as gruff as his beard.

"People really live there?"

"Yeah. Die there, too."

A conversation stopper if there ever was one. Remainder of hours four, five and six, stared out the window.

Hour nine, I found myself so bored I ventured out again.

"Business in Wichita?"

"Visiting my father."

"That sounds nice."

"It isn't."

Alrighty, then. I turned back to my reflection and spent hours 10 through 24 praying we'd get to Wichita as soon as humanly possible.

It was he who broke the silence next, after we had picked up our vending machine breakfasts somewhere outside of Shawnee.

"Why Las Vegas?" he asked through a mouthful of peanut butter and cheese crackers.

"Gonna be a blackjack dealer."

"Are you old enough?"

"How old do you have to be?"

"21."

"Really?"

"Pretty positive." Thus began a conversation that carried us all the way to the Wichita bus terminal. Suddenly I found myself walking alongside my new acquaintance. I didn't see the harm; after all I had two hours to kill until I could resume manifesting my destiny, which would now be comprised of something other than dealing blackjack.

"Sure your dad won't mind me tagging along?"

"Yes."

We walked silently past sun-beaten storefronts, grateful for the fresh air and lack of engine noise. After a while, we reached a pair of imposing iron gates. I looked inside and saw we had come to a cemetery.

"Oh. I'm sorry," I said.

"Don't be." He smiled at me and for the first time I noticed that his eyes were blue like mine. Inside, he led me to a marble bench in the shade of a sprawling oak. He sat as motionless as the tree until I began to wonder if I was going to miss my bus. Finally he spoke.

"Do you remember the barber shop we passed, Nate's on 3rd?"

I confessed I didn't.

"That's the spot where my father and I last spoke 30 years ago. I had a major crush on this girl, and I needed my father's car to take her out that night. For some reason he said no, and we got into a shouting match. I took off and hitchhiked my way to the Coast. When I called two weeks later my mother gave me the news."

He looked around him at the neatly manicured rows of grass and the black marble markers shining in the sun.

"So I make the trip here every month to say what I never got a chance to say while he was here."

I couldn't believe it. "You come here every month?"

"I do. I keep hoping I'll get proof – a sign of forgiveness. Sometimes I get a fleeting glimpse that he's here, you know, or a sense that he's listening. But it's never enough to convince me. It's never enough."

I sat with him for a while, watching the oak's green leaves that were now dancing in the breeze. Then I pulled myself to my feet, shook his hand and said goodbye.

"Every month," I said aloud as I walked back up the gravel road. I couldn't imagine making that lousy trip from Jersey more than once in a lifetime. And he was making that haul 12 times a year.

I got back to the station in time to see the black-throated beast roll off west without me. I found a pay phone and dropped my lunch money in the slot. My mom wasn't home, but I talked to the answering machine. I told it that I was on my way home.

I didn't put the apology on the machine. I wanted to use the ride home to perfect what I was going to say when she opened the front door. At the next stop I changed my mind and called collect. The sweetest sound I ever heard was my mother's voice accepting the call.

We didn't invent the wheel

BY MICHAEL MEDVED

In an unforgettable put-down of self-righteous ebullience, turn-of-the-century Congressional leader Thomas Bracket Reed told Theodore Roosevelt: "If there is one achievement more than any other for which I admire you, Mr. President, it is for your original discovery of the Ten Commandments."

In today's Jewish world, many newly minted religious enthusiasts claim credit for original discovery not only of the Ten Commandments, but of the entire Torah. In the process, they may violate the Fifth of the Big Ten – by failing to honor their own parents.

This point came home to me some years ago when I shared a Shabbat meal with an impassioned and impressive young man who described his tortuous journey from hippie to chassid. The only missing ingredient in this narrative was any mention of his Jewish background as a child. When I asked about his parents and their religious orientation, he declared that they were "good people, but they kept nothing... we lived like goyim." Only after persistent questioning did the full picture emerge – that his parents had been active members of a Conservative synagogue who, despite their lack of traditional observance, forced their son to attend Hebrew school and gave him a Bar Mitzvah. Without the benefit of that long-ago upbringing, would this spiritual seeker have proven as open as he did to the Jewish message he embraced as an adult?

It is wonderful and, indeed, miraculous, that so many Jews today take their religious heritage more seriously than did their parents or grandparents. Whether strictly Orthodox baalei t'shuva (returnees) or New Age advocates of "Jewish renewal," hundreds of thousands of Gen-X'ers and Baby Boomers fearlessly explore their own paths to spiritual fulfillment. In so doing, however, they should acknowledge their debt to parents who made such discoveries possible. The fact that the older generation may have been less observant or intense shouldn't provide license to denigrate its Jewish commitment altogether. This same generation held seders, dressed the kids up on Purim, founded and supported Hebrew schools, old age homes, cemeteries and – not insignificantly – built synagogues and federations that [illegible] Jewish identity while their searching offspring found their own winding way toward greater commitment.

We should avoid the temptation to enhance our own righteousness by under-estimating the place from which we started. In an odd sense, too many of us have turned the old idea of yichus – family pride – on its head: rather than building ourselves up by bragging about the piety of our parents, we build ourselves up by bragging about their ignorance and assimilation.

Wouldn't it be more constructive, and more consistent with the commandment to honor our parents, if we searched for those aspects of our upbringing where they may have planted – albeit inadvertently – the seeds for future religious growth?

Former Tennessee governor Lamar Alexander tells the story of his mother's angry reaction to a news account that referred to his having grown up "in poverty." "How dare they say that!" she angrily told her son. "You always had enough to eat, and clean clothes, and even piano lessons!" Similarly, it's inappropriate to try to embellish your own spiritual achievements by exaggerating the religious poverty of your parents' household. So what if they didn't keep kosher, or observe the Sabbath, or study sacred texts? In an era of assimilation, merely maintaining pride in Jewish identity must count as a notable distinction. And even in homes with little or no Judaic substance, it should be possible to recall general lessons and values that shaped an individual for eventual growth and affirmation.

The Torah specifically associates the obligation of respecting parents with durability and survival: "Honor your father and your mother, so that your days will be lengthened upon the land that The Lord, your God, gives you" (Exodus 20, 12). The reward of lengthened days may not involve increased life expectancy for a specific person, but it certainly applies to national continuity. According to the Meshech Chochmah, a revered sage of the 19th Century, the importance of honoring parents stems from the need to forge an unbroken chain connecting each of us through the generations directly to Sinai. In other words, the entire tradition depends upon it.

Whatever failings, foibles or infidelities we discern in the prior generation's pattern of observance, our parents still stand a crucial, even mystical step closer to revelation and to the Creator. Those who claim ultimate authorship of their own excellence deny basic principles of Torah teaching. Oscar Wilde felt appropriately suspicious of those prideful souls who endlessly emphasized their own grubby origins. "He is a self-made man," he quipped, "and he worships his Creator."

We have been called to worship a more worthy Creator, and to honor continuity above originality.

CONFESSIONS OF A FORMER PARENT BASHER

by Neal Karlen

My maniacally scribbling pen dropped to the floor in the middle of an upper-case letter and I watched it fall as though I'd been stricken by a sudden neurological disorder. My Chassidic rabbi, seeing that I was no longer taking notes as if I'd just stumbled upon the biggest scoop since Woodward met Bernstein, looked up to see why I'd stopped writing.

"Go on, I'm taping," I said, nodding toward the recorder at my feet. "Now I can just listen." And the rabbi resumed translating for my benefit from the Shulchan Aruch, the definitive compilation by Joseph Caro (1488-1575) that codifies everything anybody would ever want to know about Judaism and the Torah but didn't know where to find. Today I'd asked this Lubavitcher scholar about what the Fifth Commandment meant – the one about honoring one's parents.

In a world of spiritual shysters and consciousness-raising swamis, the esteemed Lubavitcher rebbe is the real deal, a wise teacher and a humble role model as well. I'd found my rabbi while hunting, like a grave-digger with amnesia, for where I had long ago buried the names, habits, beliefs and tools for study that had once been a part of my day-to-day life.

I'd been raised with those rituals, and had fled from them the first second I was legally able to move out of the house, eventually making my way to New York and my first writing job as a crime reporter. There, on the crime beat in New York, mobsters shrieking obscenities at me on courthouse steps hadn't made me drop my pen. Wailing widows, their husbands' murders gone unavenged via judicial technicality, couldn't make me drop my pen. Today, however, I was paralyzed, hearing Rabbi Caro's explication of the dozens of ways one must honor one's parents.

Perhaps Commandment Five had always weighed heavily on me because I knew it was one of the Big Ten I could actually do something about, and also the one I was most likely to violate. Not having the disposition for murder, for example, or the presence of mind to perjure myself, I was reasonably sure that I wouldn't commit homicide or bear false witness.

But how does somebody begin observing the commandment to "Honor thy father and thy mother" after spending his entire adult life not simply ignoring his parents and their dictates, but actively mocking them? I mocked them by the way I lived, and I also made fun of my upbringing in front of my would-be fancy New York friends.

"My parents? For the first five years of my life I thought my name was shut up."

"My parents?" When I was born, the doctor said 'What a treasure!' and my folks said, 'Yeah, let's bury it.'"

"You know when my parents believe life is viable? When the fetus graduates from medical school."

"When I told my parents I was marrying a non-Jew, they both took an overdose of mah-jongg tiles."

With this monologue having run on continuous loop through my mind for years, how would I even begin performing t'shuvah, the turning that points us back toward God's forgiveness? And even if I did, how could I convince my septuagenerian parents, both vital human beings, that I not only loved them, but rather honored their very existence – and because they gave me life, not just material for limp one-liners?

The Lubavitcher rabbi went on, detailing the simpler ways of honoring one's parents, from performing menial tasks for them to not correcting them in public to not sitting in your father's chair. He also tackled the hardball questions, like what to do when a parent has gone insane. In my egotism I heard little of it. I stared at the pen on the floor, and still couldn't find the gumption to pick it up.

For the last several years of my 20s, in the last several years of Manhattan's 1980s, I spent $250 a week I couldn't afford telling a thoughtful young Yale-trained psychiatrist how much I hated my parents. Or maybe I said I hated my parents, but loved them. Or maybe I said I loved my parents, but didn't like them. I can't remember. Like getting cable, seeing a shrink was the fashionable thing to do. After each session, I would imagine being surrounded by thousands of ambitious 20-somethings, stacked by floors like drones in an ant farm, all telling their thoughtful Yalie psychiatrists how much they hated their fathers and their mothers.

"Perhaps Commandment Five had always weighed heavily on me because I knew it was one of the Big Ten I could actually do something about, and also the one I was most likely to violate."

Luckily, I was able to cut to the chase. I didn't project my neuroses onto my psychiatrist; instead, I made him an actual example of the impossible solution. Pointing to his M.D. degree on the wall, I explained that if only I had acquired one of those, as he and my father had, things would have been okay. A law, dental, or MBA degree would also have done the trick.

"And then if I'd done that," I said, indicating my shrink's wedding band and the picture on his desk of a Semitic-looking wife and two children, "it would have been like bringing home the Nobel Prize."

"I'm sorry, we're out of time," the psychiatrist said.

And so was I.

In 1989, I moved home to Minnesota. "But not to my parents' home," I always added when explaining the switch, "to my air home. To my land home. To my water home."

And then my parents' home came to me. A couple of years ago I almost died in a roller-blading accident, ending up instead with five broken bones in my left leg and a six-month stay flat on my back.

Gradually I descended into what F. Scott Fitzgerald called that "real dark night of the soul [where] it is always three o'clock in the morning, day after day." A spiritual void took root in my heart, bigger and more dangerous than a mid-life crisis, and smaller and sharper than a stiletto. Eventually it led me to the door of my Lubavitcher rabbi, who I hoped might help lead me to the door to myself. In return, if he's willing, perhaps I can help him make and hype tapes about the Shulchan Aruch.

For starters, I'll go to the synagogue with both of my parents on the anniversaries of their parents' deaths to say the mourner's prayer. I'll try not to tell the folks they're wrong in public, and I'll try to remember all the other things the rabbi taught me from that ancient text, too.

Realizing that Commandment Five says nothing about parents honoring their children, I will also reserve them the right to drive me crazy.

"Dad, can you think of any particular times when I've ever honored or dishonored you?" I asked my father one day while I was contemplating this article. We were seated in front of the television watching one of the last football games of the season.

My father considered my question. "No, I can't particularly think of any times you've dishonored me," he said.

"But honored you?" I asked, thinking of my apartment with its Phi Beta Kappa key from an Ivy League school, the heavy plaques and awards I'd won for books and articles, and the tapes of speeches and sound bytes given to everyone from the local Hadassah to the NBC Nightly News. Despite my refusal to go to medical school and my inability to find a Jewish wife, hadn't those achievements allowed him a little kvelling, the joy one's parents are supposed to feel when a child has brought them honor?

By the time I had finished silently, narcissistically going through this pointless resume, my father was back to the football game.

"Aaargh!" I said like the cartoon-strip Charlie Brown, lying on his back for the millionth time after Lucy had snatched the ball away just as he was about to kick it.

And then I remembered.

Then I remembered who's supposed to honor whom. And I knew I'd be back visiting the home I grew up in and – as Rabbi Caro said a full 400 years before Archie Bunker – staying out of the old man's chair. I knew that, like Charlie Brown lining up the ball for the million-and-first time, no matter what my parents said or how they grumbled over me, I'd keep on trying.

Today, I even picked up my pen.

a drug called hope

Dennis Brown is a Chassidic rabbi, a father, a husband and a son. But he is also a parent, in the most profound way, to hundreds of souls who have left the ranks of productive life and slid like a skidding log into a life of drug abuse, violence, homelessness and despair.

In 1996 he founded the Ness Center, a tiny mental health clinic in West Los Angeles where more than 300 people a week receive treatment for drug addiction, domestic violence and a host of society's most intractable ills.

There's Robert, for example, who had been a successful businessman but found himself at the age of 48 penniless, homeless, and addicted to alchohol and cocaine. He had heard about Dennis through a telethon and called him on the phone.

"I told him I felt panicky, that I couldn't bathe or eat and I was frightened to death," Robert recalls. "I begged him to let me into the program. He said, "No", but told me to call again the next day. This went on for 20 days, until he found out that I was sober and said I could join."

"Throughout that time, every day I had hope because I could call him back. Everyone else I called had hung up on me, including my parents. Dennis was like the parent I had wished for – someone who would care and love me without conditions, simply because I was alive."

In the world that most of us inhabit most of the time, this basic parental love is taken for granted, but getting it to people like Robert can take, well – a miracle. Ness, of course, means "miracle" in Hebrew.

When I came upon the Ness Center last year, I wondered: who better personifies the word Chassid – one who is pious, or devoted to the work of God – than those who apply the very best of themselves day in and day out to the service of the poor, the grieving and the addicted, turning ghosts into people again and bringing back hope where it seems lost forever?

Dennis nurtures them by sharing his own experience and philosophy of life. "It's hard to pinpoint the stressors that lead men to lose their ability to function," he says, but he answers them all with the concept of Chassidut, with its unconditional positive regard.

"As soon as it is injected into their bloodstream, it draws back the juvenile colors to their cheeks," Dennis says. "That's why I call this drug 'hope.'"

Dennis sows hope in weekly groups for wife batterers, sex offenders and victims of domestic violence, in addition to an anger management group, a parenting group and drug rehabilitation. He also runs the Center, and sees five or six people for individual therapy each day – plus phone calls. He's never taken a vacation.

"It's always easy to find the negative," he explains. "The court orders, the lists of bad behaviors on their records – these are part of who they are. But I find they're just good people. Sometimes they don't have the skills to do better or to overcome very difficult challenges. But they're people, and I tell them they can recover, they can stop doing what they think they can never stop."

About the size of two storefronts, the Ness Center is housed in an inconspicuous brick building just off the busy thoroughfare of La Cienega Boulevard, a stone's throw away from the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences. Its clients range from rich to poor, from the invisible to well-known performers. One of these days Dennis wants to have more space, because he has not been able to keep up with demand – even with a staff of five other therapists.

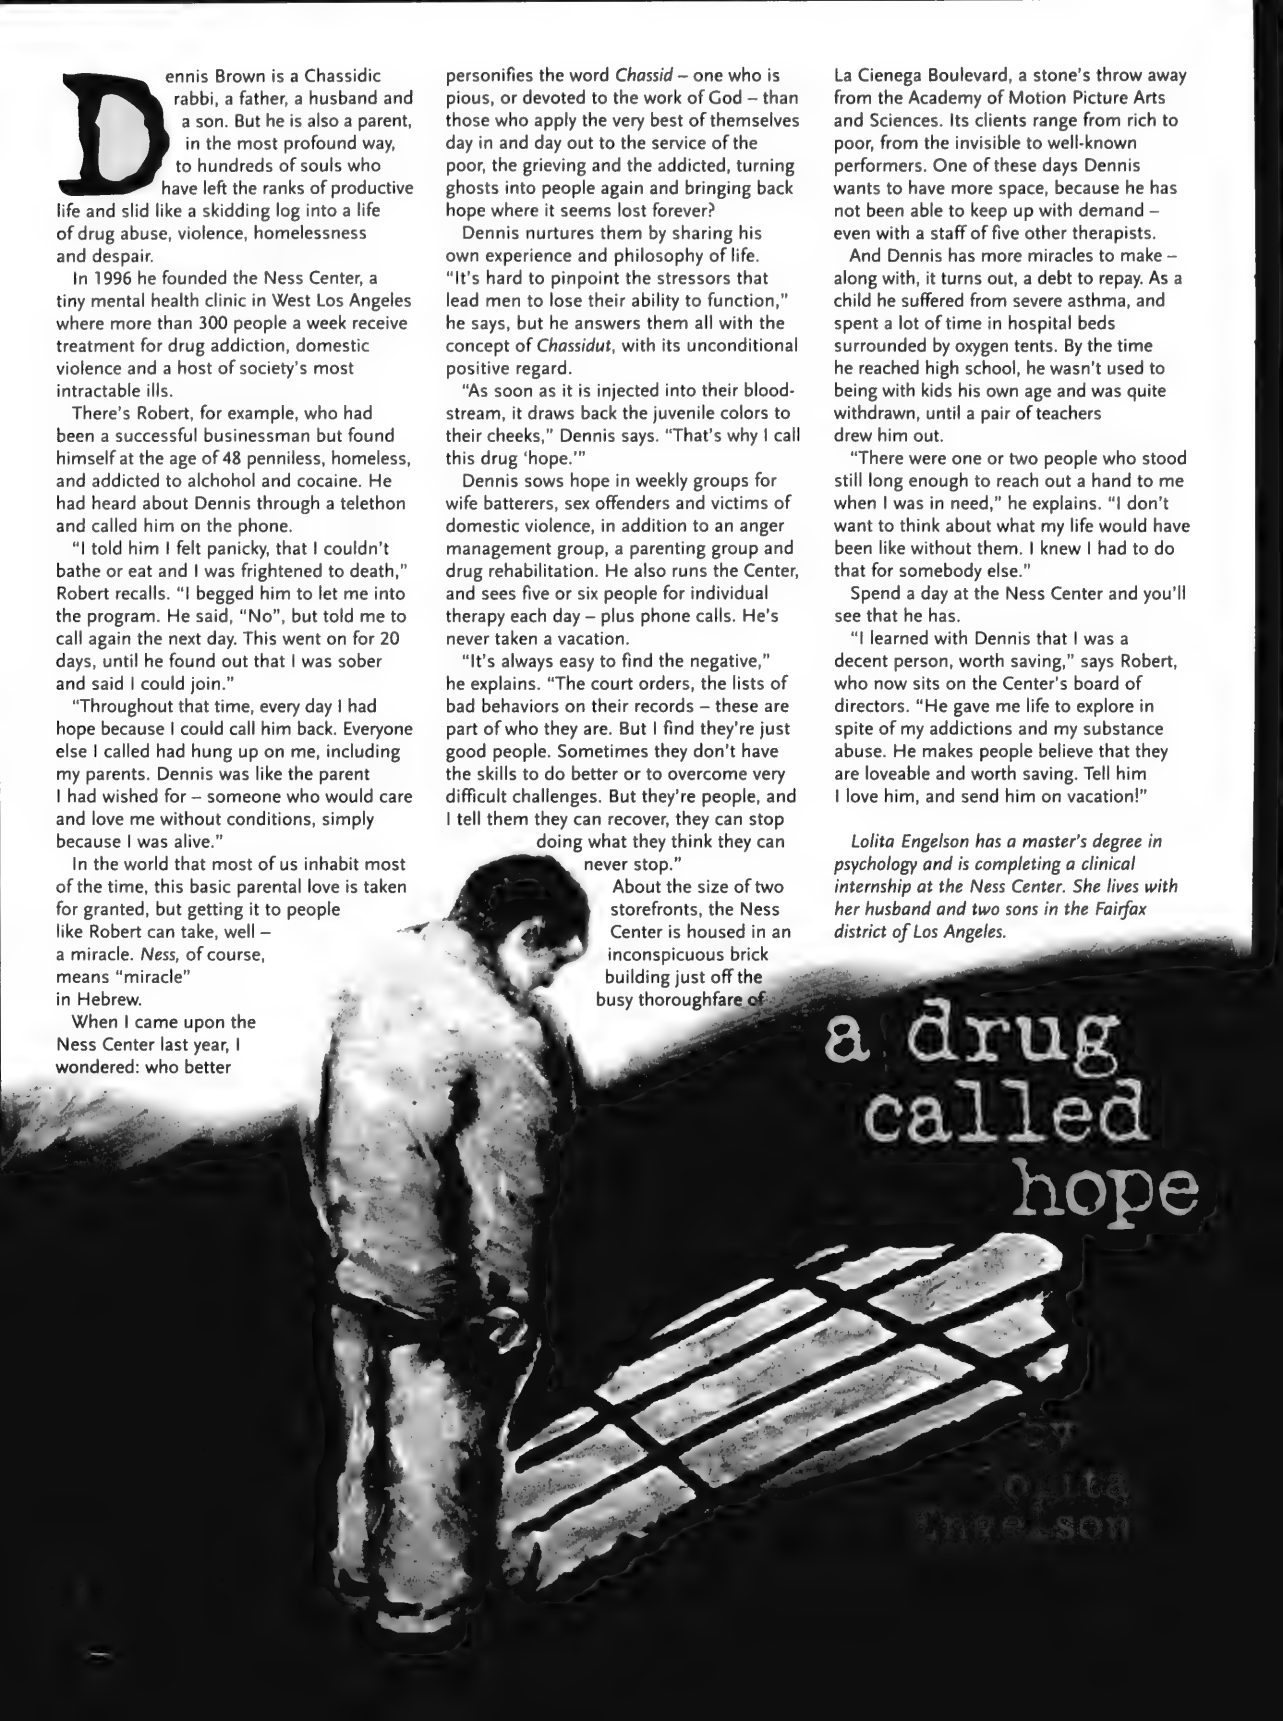
And Dennis has more miracles to make – along with, it turns out, a debt to repay. As a child he suffered from severe asthma, and spent a lot of time in hospital beds surrounded by oxygen tents. By the time he reached high school, he wasn't used to being with kids his own age and was quite withdrawn, until a pair of teachers drew him out.

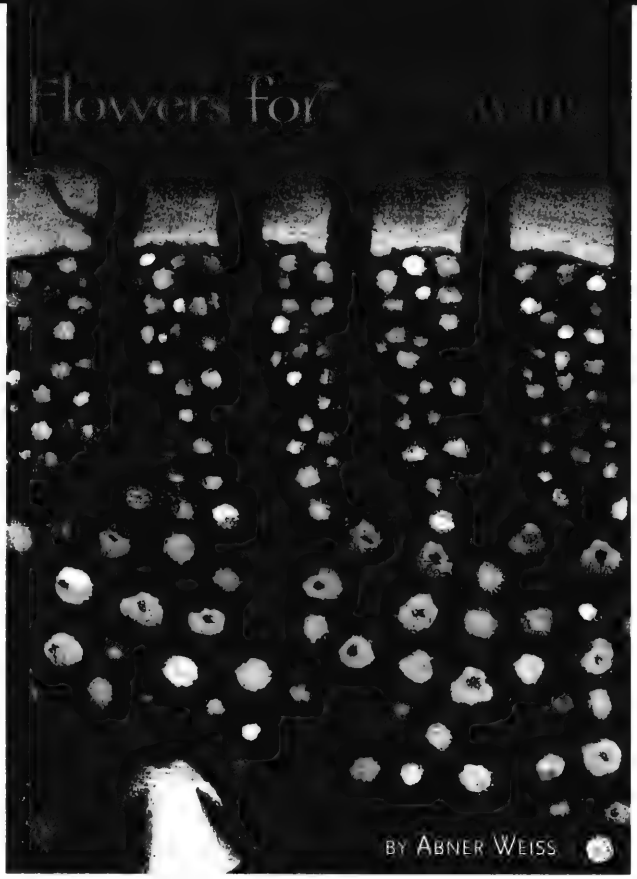
"There were one or two people who stood still long enough to reach out a hand to me when I was in need," he explains. "I don't want to think about what my life would have been like without them. I knew I had to do that for somebody else."

Spend a day at the Ness Center and you'll see that he has.

"I learned with Dennis that I was a decent person, worth saving," says Robert, who now sits on the Center's board of directors. "He gave me life to explore in spite of my addictions and my substance abuse. He makes people believe that they are loveable and worth saving. Tell him I love him, and send him on vacation!"

Lolita Engelson has a master's degree in psychology and is completing a clinical internship at the Ness Center. She lives with her husband and two sons in the Fairfax district of Los Angeles.





A father and mother once came upon their young daughter who was patiently and lovingly carving a wooden bowl and spoon.

"Is this a school project?" they asked.

"No," she replied. "It is a personal project. I am preparing these things for you."

"For us?" the parents asked incredulously. "We don't need a wooden bowl and spoon."

"Ah, but you will in a few years' time, when you are as old as Bubby and Zeide."

"What do you mean?" they asked.

"Well," said the little girl, "I heard you yelling at Bubby yesterday when she dropped her bowl of soup because her hands were trembling so much. You shouted at her for being so clumsy and said she had ruined your beautiful dinner service. You yelled that you would get her a wooden bowl and spoon so that she would do no more damage. So, as I was wondering what gift to get for you, you had let me know what you will be needing pretty soon."

The message is clear: Our children will one day treat us exactly as they have seen us treat our parents. The ways of relating to the older generation are caught, not taught. Our gestures, tone of voice and actions show our children what our real attitudes are. Our homes are informal laboratories for intergenerational commitments. Consciously or unconsciously, we are role models of filial piety. We can choose to become either the future beneficiaries of what we model when we are old and vulnerable ourselves or the future victims of our insensitivities.

Flowers provide a demonstration of this concept. The non-Jewish norm is to send flowers to funerals. This is not the normative Jewish response to loss. When they are dead, the beloved departed can no longer enjoy the beauty of the colors and the fragrance of our floral tributes. Therefore, our practice is to delight the living with our gifts. So let us remember our parents with flowers on every possible occasion. Let us send flowers to the living.

To be sure, flowers are not only physical objects but metaphors of caring. They reflect our thoughtfulness and our desire to please those we love while they still have the capacity of enjoyment. I have always marvelled that people who are too busy with their over-programmed lives to spend regular quality time with their parents somehow find the time to say Kaddish for them daily for 11 months. I am glad they do so, but I would be far happier if they had shown reverence for their parents when the old folks were waiting in vain for regular visits. Those visits would have been real flowers for the living.

"I have always marvelled that people who are too busy with their over-programmed lives to spend regular quality time with their parents somehow find the time to say Kaddish for them daily for 11 months."

We Jews have a wonderful custom of dedicating buildings, institutions, hospital rooms, prayerbooks and other things we value to the memory of our parents. Why do we choose to wait until they are gone to show them honor? Imagine the nachas they would have if they were present at the dedication of a building or an educational program in their name. That would be a meaningful metaphorical gift of flowers to the living.

The commonplace cultural perception of parenthood makes this difficult. Parent-bashing has become the main instrument of contemporary psychotherapy. Our therapists assure us that our parents are responsible for all our dysfunctional behaviors and relationships. They have either smothered us with love, or wickedly withheld their love from us. They were either overly critical of our behavior, or they failed to correct defects when our personalities were still being formed.

Parent-bashing is neither good psychology nor sound social policy. It is certainly bad religion. It shifts responsibilty for who we are from ourselves to others. It weakens the fabric of the family. Above all, it disregards the genuine and sustained love and sacrifices of the overwhelming majority of parents. The Torah imperatives to honor and revere parents are based upon reciprocal goodness. We are commanded to recognize the kindness of our parents and to reciprocate it when the tables are turned and they need us.

Of course there are no perfect parents. Indeed, nobody is perfect. The greatest shortage in the world is of perfect people. I have yet to meet one. We all make mistakes. When they are parents, our children will make their own mistakes. We can best prepare them for their role as parents by not only modeling respect and reverence, but also by resisting the temptation to blame our parents for our own problems.

Finally, I should like to offer a caveat. Halachah, the Jewish legal code, requires us to tolerate abusive parents when they have become incapacitated by age and illness. However, respect for parents has its limits. The Torah does not require us to tolerate abuse from parents who are deliberately controlling, manipulative and disrespectful of us. Such disrespect is called shibbud l'av va'em – literally, enslavement by our parents. Shibbud l'av va'em is immoral and self-defeating, and we should avoid using it with our own children. Indeed, what is needed in all family relationships is consistent caring, respect and regard. These are the truest, and the most enduring, flowers that we can offer the living.

I wasn't taught to respect my elders

by Karen C. Springer

Conventions of society and notions of proper etiquette have long since held a certain standard of expectations for what children should be taught and how they must act. To deny children these valuable lessons can leave a parent with the stigma of irresponsibility. So it is no surprise that to this day, many not only adhere to these "fundamental" values but actively strive to teach them to their own children. Values such as respecting your elders and authority, following rules and not disobeying them are but two of these highly revered standards of conduct. However, teaching children the opposite (which many might consider sacrilegious) can be positively liberating to these "irresponsible" parents and their "wayward" children. So, to my parents' credit, there are many such "values" that I was not taught as a child.

I was not taught to respect my elders. Instead, I was taught that, young or old, some people deserved respect and some people did not.

I was not taught to accept what I was told by people in positions of authority. Instead, I was taught to question authority if I felt it necessary.

I was not taught to do as I was told. Instead, I was taught to question EVERYTHING and make decisions for myself.

I was not taught to accept the status quo. Instead, I was taught that often the status quo was outdated or illogical and it was my responsibility to try to change it or, at the very least, work around it.

I was not taught that conventions of society needed to shape the stages of my life. Instead, I was taught to shape my life according to my own conventions.

I was not taught to conform. Instead, I was taught to stand by my convictions, even in the face of intimidation.

I was not forced or pressured to do any particular thing. Instead, I was encouraged to pursue anything I expressed interest in.

I was not raised with any expectations. Instead, I was raised as an individual who could do whatever I chose, whatever would make ME happy.

I was not raised with restrictions. Instead, I was raised to appreciate the freedom I was given.

And, I was never treated as a child. Instead, I was treated as a person who, even at a very young age, was consulted on any family decisions that would affect me.

My parents taught me to be defiant in the most positive sense of the word. To think for myself, be independent and never fear expressing myself. They gave me self-respect and courage. And, most important, they taught me to understand myself, as well as the crucial importance of understanding them.

As I look back upon my childhood, I do not recall my parents ever needing to discipline me. They laid the foundation for me to make decisions for myself. They gave me the confidence to do whatever I want, but to do so responsibly. I am what I am because of my parents, not in spite of them, nor as a result of trying to please them. Most of all, my parents gave me love, support, and the freedom to be my own unique individual.

So, with tears in my eyes, I say, "Mom and Dad, I applaud you for your courage in being 'irresponsible' and for your faith in me as a person. I thank you for everything you didn't teach me and everything you did. I cherish the lessons you taught me and those you allowed me to learn for myself. The tests that life has given you and the strength, goodwill, and perseverance with which you've tackled them is a lesson immeasurable to me. You are my best friends, my idols, and the two people I love and respect most in the world."

HONORING

Some four million Americans are now afflicted with Alzheimer's disease, and as life expectancy increases this number will continue to grow. More and more of us are being faced with a legal, moral and emotional dilemma: can we institutionalize a parent who suffers from this illness? Like many contemporary moral issues, this one is addressed in all its complexities within Jewish law.

On the one hand, the Torah – the root source of all of our law – clearly commands us to "Honor your father and your mother" (Exodus 20:12, Deuteronomy 5:16) and again: "You shall each revere his mother and his father" (Leviticus 19:3). These seem to be absolute requirements regardless of the parents' behavior. On the other hand, what exactly is "honor"? If the parent has deteriorated to such an extent that he or she requires being drugged or having a diaper changed, is it "honor" and "reverence" for a child to do this? Or is it greater honor for an outsider to do it? What about emotional strains on the child? How much must he or she bear?

The problem of parents who have mentally deteriorated is mentioned in Jewish sources as early as the second century BCE, and the question of who should deliver care to them has been hotly debated by religious authorities for more than 800 years. The main focus of the debate has been a Talmudic passage that became the basis for most subsequent legal discussion: "Rav Assi [who lived in Babylon] had an aged mother. She said to him: 'I want jewelry!' He made some for her. 'I want a husband!' He replied: 'I'll look for one for you.' 'I want a husband as handsome as you!' He left her and went to Israel. When he heard that she was coming after him, he asked Rabbi Yohanan: 'Is it permissible to leave Israel for hutz la'aretz [the Diaspora]?' He replied: 'It is forbidden.' [He asked:] 'Towards his mother – what is the law?' He replied: 'I don't know.'.... In the meantime, Rav Assi heard that her coffin was coming. He said: 'Had I known, I would not have left Babylon!' [Or: 'Had I known, I would not have asked permission to leave Israel!'] (Kiddushin 31b)."

This story is very problematic. Was Rav Assi's mother mentally disturbed (she seems to be interested in marrying her own son) or merely crotchety? Can a child run away when he can no longer tolerate a parent's erratic behavior? And what does the final ambiguous sentence mean? Did Rav Assi regret abandoning his mother, or is he saying that not only did he act properly by leaving her, he was not even required to meet her coffin?

Halachic authorities have interpreted this story in two conflicting directions. Maimonides (1135-1204) and his followers used it to legitimize custodial care, while Ra'avad of Posquieres (1120-1198) and his followers came to the opposite conclusion.

Maimonides codified the story as follows: "If one's father or mother should become mentally disordered, he should try to treat them as their mental state demands, until God has pity on them. But if he finds he cannot endure the situation because of their extreme madness, let him leave them and go away, commanding others to care for them as befits them." (Mamrim 6:10)

According to the last sentence, it is perfectly legitimate to institutionalize a parent with Alzheimer's disease, even though this is not explicitly stated in the story about Rav Assi.

Ra'avad of Posquieres, Maimonides' classic critic, disagrees (Hassagot, ad loc.): "This is not a correct ruling! If he goes and leaves him, who shall he command to watch him?!" Apparently, in Ra'avad's time and place there was no option of custodial care. Indeed, the first Jewish old age home seems to have been founded in Amsterdam in 1749.

All subsequent authorities in halacha, or Jewish law, have aligned themselves with either Maimonides or Ra'avad. The Maimonidean camp replied that since Rav Assi's mother was brought to Israel in a coffin, he must have ordered others to take care of his mother. Regarding the practical issue raised by Ra'avad – "who shall he command..." – they replied that the child can hire someone to take care of the parent. They further stated that in the case of a parent who has deteriorated mentally, an outsider can do a better job than a child for two reasons. First of all, the parent will be embarrassed to misbehave in front of an outsider. Second, an outsider can raise his voice or physically restrain the parent if necessary, while a child would never be able to do such things nor be allowed under Jewish law to do so.

Ra'avad's followers replied that it is clear from the end of the story (see the first translation above) that Rav Assi regretted having left his mother and therefore the story proves that custodial care is prohibited. Furthermore, if, as Maimonides claims, "others" can take care of the parent, then why can't the child do so himself, since he has a better understanding of his parent's desires and idiosyncrasies? In addition, this camp found support from Rabbi Jacob Ben Asher (1270-1343) who, in his code (Tur, Yoreh Deah 240), quotes Ra'avad after Maimonides, which seems to indicate his agreement with the former. Last, the Ra'avad camp asserted that Rav Assi's mother was not mentally disturbed but rather old and crotchety. Rav Assi left her because he knew he could not honor her requests properly. But a parent suffering from Alzheimer's needs extra physical care from the child, while his demented requests can be ignored because he no longer has all of his faculties.

What then are the halachic options open to a child faced with the dilemma of caring for a senile parent? It appears from the above analysis that there are three:

1) A child with stamina and emotional fortitude can follow the line of thought advocated by Ra'avad and his camp. They view "Honor thy father and thy mother" as an absolute value that cannot be absolved by the erratic behavior of the parent. Regardless of how a son or daughter feels, he or she must personally take care of their parents as commanded by the Torah.

> "If the parent has deteriorated to such an extent that he or she requires being drugged or having a diaper changed, is it "honor" and "reverence" for a child to do this?

2) Others may place their parent in a nursing home, following the example of Rav Assi as interpreted by Maimonides and his followers. According to this view, a child is not personally obligated to care for the parent, if he must sacrifice his own emotional health in the process. They further state that in cases of mental deterioration, the honor of the parent can be better served by an outsider who can do things the child cannot do and that the parent would not want him to do.

3) I believe the preferred halachic solution is one implied by a number of the rabbis in the Maimonidean camp: namely, to keep the parent at home, but pay an outsider to attend to the functions that are painful or inappropriate for the child to perform.

This third solution incorporates the concerns of both Ra'avad and Maimonides. On the one hand, the parent feels wanted and loved by the child, a feeling frequently lacking in an institutional setting. The parent also can function better at home than in a new and strange environment. By keeping the parent at home, the child fulfills the commandment to "honor your father and your mother" in a direct and personal fashion as demanded by Ra'avad. On the other hand, following Maimonides, the child protects the parent's honor and the child's own emotional health by ensuring that a professional is on hand who can perform functions not in keeping with the honor owed a parent by a child.

A parent suffering from severe and progressive dementia is still worthy of honor and reverence, and we can safely provide both within a framework articulated by our tradition.

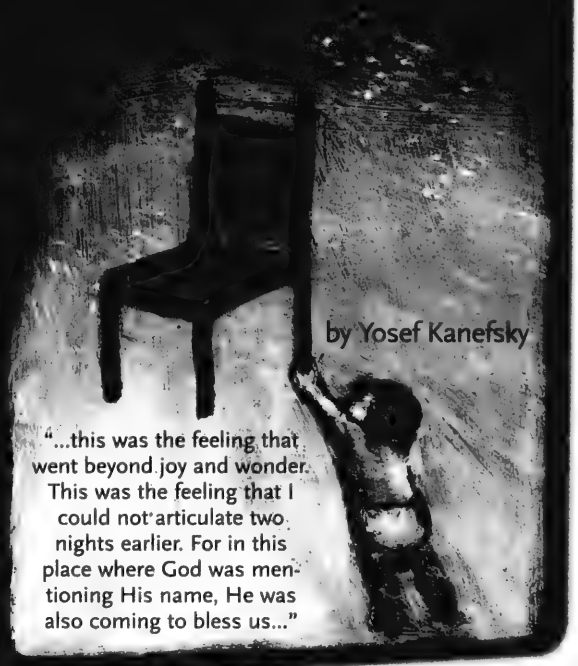
where God speaks his Name

by Yosef Kanefsky



"...this was the feeling that went beyond joy and wonder. This was the feeling that I could not articulate two nights earlier. For in this place where God was mentioning His name, He was also coming to bless us..."

It had been eight years since the last time I had held a newborn in my arms. As I gently touched his tiny fingers and cradled his head in my palm, I felt so many different things. After eight years, we were parents again. I felt intense joy, and a sense of wonder. But I was aware that I was feeling something else too – something that I wasn't able to articulate, but that was unmistakably present in the room.

Two nights later, on Friday night, the community gathered in our home to celebrate the new arrival. As I strained my sleep-deprived mind to produce a fitting Torah thought for the occasion, the biblical verse that kept presenting itself over and over was one from the end of the previous week's reading. It seemed to have no relevance to the birth of a child at all, but I couldn't get it out of my mind.

The verse reads, "In every place that I mention My name, there I will come and bless you."

The context in which this verse appears is God's command to the Israelites that they build simple earthen altars for their sacrificial offerings. He seems to be reassuring them that despite the simplicity of the altars, they will suffer no lack of God's blessing. But the wording is curious. Where precisely are the places in which God mentions His name? How would we know how to identify them? And what exactly does the verse mean when it refers to God "mentioning His name"? I couldn't remember the answers to any of these questions. Yet I could not wriggle free that night from this verse's repeated calls.

Before the celebration on Friday, I found a moment to glance at the classical rabbinic interpretations. Each of them effectively reads the word "I" not as "I", but as "you" – that is, "In all the places that you will cause My name to be mentioned, there I will come and bless you. These places range from the Temple in Jerusalem to any room in which we study Torah. In all of these beautiful interpretations, it is we who do the mentioning of God's name. But on this night, my heart insisted that there was a more literal reading, too.

I began to think about the various occasions in the Torah when God mentions His own name. The very first proved to be all that I needed: "And God created the human being in His image, in the image of God He created him." God mentioned His own name at the moment when He first declared, "Human being! You shall be created in the image of God." Accordingly, He mentions His name each and every time a child emerges from its mother's womb, pointing to the newborn and saying, "You too are created in the image of God."

This, then, is the "every place" to which the verse refers – "every place" a child is born.

And this was the feeling that went beyond joy and wonder. This was the feeling that I could not articulate two nights earlier. For in this place where God was mentioning His name, He was also coming to bless us – to bless us with life, and with opportunity and with love. There are more than six billion people on this earth, and God knows and bestows blessings upon each one of them. But this particular moment, in a hospital room at 3:30 in the morning, was our special moment for receiving God's blessing. At that moment, it was just us and God. There is no experience more humbling than this. And there is no experience more exhilarating. And there is no feeling that defies verbal articulation in quite the same way.

I've reflected upon this in the weeks since and have come to believe that there is only one thing that God asks in return for this blessing of childbirth. God just asks that we never forget what the moment felt like, so that as the years go by, every time we gently touch our children's fingers, or lay our hands upon their heads, we feel God's presence and God's blessing all over again.

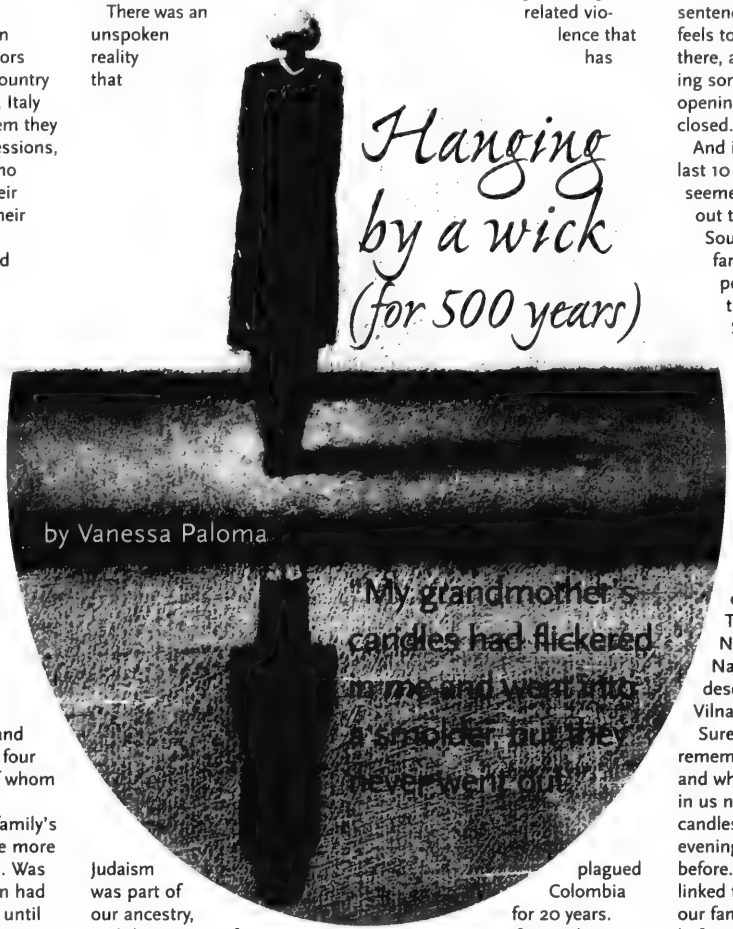
Hanging by a wick (for 500 years)

by Vanessa Paloma



My foremothers Ana, Rebeca and Ita never knew what effect the light of their candles would have on their descendants. They sailed the ocean from the land of spices and olive oil to the new world of promises, the new world where they hoped they would not be ridden anymore by fear. The candles came with them, and eventually – after generations – their light lit an entirely new flame.

After the expulsion from Spain in 1492, my ancestors moved from country to country through the Netherlands, Italy and Morocco. Behind them they left almost all their possessions, and friends and family who were still partly hiding their souls and their love for their dear tradition. But in the new and mysterious world across the great sea, in the green and daunting jungles of el Nuevo Mundo, Ana, Rebeca and Ita would be free – or would they?

Ana Machado was the first to arrive, traveling as a child with her parents to Panama. From Panama they gradually made their way to the Andes of Colombia and finally, in the 1930s, to Colombia's capital, Bogotá. Ana's daughter Rebeca had three children, Inés, José and Joaquín. At 16, Inés, known as Ita, married a world-traveled engineer and devout atheist. They had four children, the youngest of whom is my mother.

During this time, the family's Jewish traditions became more and more whittled down. Was it because the Inquisition had been active in Colombia until only few years before they arrived? Or was it the well-known lure of freedom that drew this artistically inclined family to cultural and intellectual pursuits rather than religious ones? Either way, by the time I was born my family was one in which religion played no part.

I attended Catholic school, and I was instructed by my parents not to believe anything they taught me but to follow along. To say the least, I was a spiritually confused child. I prayed at nights to a God who was not invited into the life of our home. I knew I did not agree with the teachings I received at school, so I read some books on Jewish mysticism. For some reason, these were the books that jumped out at me at the International Book Fair in Bogotá when I was 15.

There was an unspoken reality that Judaism was part of our ancestry, and there were a few mementos that evoked Judaism in my grandmother Ita's apartment. Under her 1940s radio was a shofar, and in her garden was a healthy rue plant. The smells of buñuelos rolled around during Januká, and her cakes recalled the North African cooking our family had picked up along the way.

And there were candles. Sometimes on Friday nights, my grandmother would light two candles and say a blessing in Spanish. She and I were close, and I treasure my memories of staying over at her house. On the table in her kitchen, the candles were lit – not discussed in any way, but lit – and they burned throughout the evening until the wax was all consumed.

Eventually, my parents and I moved to the United States, fleeing the drug-related violence that has plagued Colombia for 20 years.

Soon afterwards, Ita died. Our Judaism was again submerged as we adapted to life in another new land.

My grandmother's candles had flickered in me and went into a smolder, but they never went out. Then four years ago I moved to Los Angeles, and the shimmering embers slowly began to grow into a raging flame. I started by lighting candles of my own – Chanukah candles – and the fire burned more and more until the next Passover, when I found a synagogue that moved me, and I began to grow into Shabbat. I've learned Hebrew and have been to Israel three times, most recently with my mother who now has joined this journey with me. I've studied with many wonderful teachers, and sometimes I have the strange experience of feeling I can finish their sentences for them. My Judaism feels to me like it was always there, as though I'm not learning something new as much as opening a door that had been closed. Or perhaps just left ajar.

And it isn't only me. Over the last 10 years – coincidentally, it seemed – dispersed throughout the United States and South America, my whole family has begun to incorporate Jewish practice into their lives. On the last Sukkoth before she died, my aunt Nina built her first sukkah on the family farm outside Bogotá. My cousin Greta in Minneapolis now celebrates every Shabbat with her two boys, and my mother in Oklahoma teaches art in a synagogue school. My aunt in Washington, D.C., has changed her name from Teresa to Tirzah. And in New York, my cousin Nancy has just married a descendant of the revered Vilna Gaon.

Surely those small wicks I remember from my childhood, and which have rekindled Torah in us now, are connected to the candles burned on Friday evenings for three generations before. And they in turn are linked to candles that burned in our family for many centuries before that.

I salute the strength and persistence that Ana, Rebeca and Ita found in the face of a growing disconnection to Judaism. It took their connection to maintain the flame alive. They held on to the candles, and those candles held on to us.

Graves under my Chuppah

It's an old custom for orphans to visit the graves of their dead parents and invite them to the wedding, but Hadassah and I did not know the location of our dear ones' graves. To travel to Auschwitz was out of the question, so we settled for a "Prayer for the Dead" under the chuppah. As the rabbi slowly read the ketubah, I had time to invite our families in my mind.

I could feel their presence. Father smiled, looking just the way I'd seen him in a dream when I was in Kazakhstan. Mother was so peaceful, her lovely face glowing with love and goodness. Her strawberry-blonde hair had turned silvery-white, and I could see tears rolling down her face.

My little brothers – oh, how I would have loved to embrace them! They were all happy, wishing me "Mazel tov." And then there was Hadassah's family, whom I had never met. In my mind I introduced the two sides.

I addressed my father: "Look at her. She is a pure Jewish soul. All of you are resting in the highest and holiest place, sheltered beneath the wings of the Creator. I wasn't worthy of being with you. You sent me away. Now you've come to my wedding, to wish me and her 'Mazel tov!'"

Cries of "Mazel tov!" rang in the air, and I came back to reality. If I'd told anyone who had joined us at the ceremony, they would surely have thought me crazy. But I've repeated the same invitation at the wedding of each of my children. The feeling of my family's presence is always the same, and the conversation is the same. They come, indeed, to bless us with "Mazel tov!"

My beautiful bride wiped the tears from my face. Little did she know that I had just met her family and mine. She presumed that they were tears of happiness – and she was right.

The Missing Chicken

Once, when the Karelitz family sat down to the table to eat, Rebbitzen Karelitz noticed that 7-year-old Avraham Yeshaya was not eating.

"Why aren't you eating?" she asked him. The youngster replied, "I don't have a fork!"

The mother looked back and forth from the child to his plate, from the plate to the child. She suddenly realized that she had also forgotten to give him chicken.

Avraham Yeshaya shamefacedly looked at his mother, but didn't say a word. His mother realized that her Avraham Yeshaya (later to become the Chazon Ish) didn't want to hurt her feelings. Rather than mention the missing chicken, he merely mentioned the fork and let his mother realize what else she had forgotten.

Giving by Taking

R' Menachem Mendel of Vizhnitz, famed author of Tiemach Tzaddik, was accustomed to have his mother safeguard his money. Although in her later years he was her sole source of support, he continued to have her watch his money. Whenever he needed to buy some snuff tobacco, he would come to her home and ask her for some money. "Mother, dear, could you please give me some money to buy tabak?" he would ask her. The great feeling he gave his mother that she still was needed was his way of honoring her.

Saying Goodbye

A Jerusalemite woman took upon herself the task of caring for her ill and elderly father. The father saw the strain this placed on her and begged her to return home. "If you truly have my honor in mind, I beg you to go," he said. Reluctantly, she did.

Very shortly afterwards, the father passed away. The daughter was inconsolable, blaming herself for having abandoned him and feeling she had caused his death.

R' Aryeh Levine of Jerusalem sought to calm her fears. "Even if you had remained at his bedside, he would have passed away," he told the woman. "A person's years are granted from Heaven. No one lives a moment beyond his time. Had you remained with him in spite of his insistence, you would have felt doubly terrible – first, that you did not fulfill the mitzvah of kibbud av, and secondly, that his anguish over your refusal might have hastened his death. This way at least you know that you listened to his last wish!"

"Understand with Wisdom.
Be wise with Understanding."
–Sefer Yetzirah, The Book of Formation 1:4

To Moshe and Naomi Sasson, my beautiful parents.

the Father of Wisdom

the Mother of Understanding

by Gahl Sasson

Many of us, especially at our age, misunderstand time and try to defy it. I happen to be living in the City of Angels, which is ironically the center of time-defiance in the world. Here people desperately try to erase their wrinkles, lie about their age as if it were their income tax, dye their hair, and come up with extremely creative gimmicks to create the illusion of youth.

Why? Who is responsible for the bad PR of time and age? Let's look at the correlation between how we perceive time and how we treat our elders and our parents. In more nature-oriented traditions, among them some of the tribes of central and southern Africa, individuals who manage to survive to reach an older age are considered to be blessed and fortunate.

They become the Elders, the wise ones, to whom everyone else can turn for counsel. The passage of time in one's life is regarded in a positive way and celebrated with special festivities; wrinkles are a privilege, silver hair a blessing! The Elders in these cultures become storytellers, and the story they tell is of their own life.

In our Western culture, we value what is fresh and new, which encourages vigor, creativity and technological advancement. But the consequence is a certain disposability in our culture, and a celebration of youth that forces youngsters into success before they know how to handle it. We actually deprive them of youth, in a way. Later we wonder why so many of our youngsters dive into drugs or suffer fatigue syndromes.

So what is the value of time, why is age so important?

Let's take a look at the kabbalistic Tree of Life, with its 10 spheres or sefirot. This Tree is a magnificent symbol of the blueprint of creation. Each sphere represents a bank of symbols and controls a certain archetypal energy. It is said that God created the cosmos using this Tree, so let us find where God concealed time on it and try to understand His intentions.

On the Tree of Life, time and age are associated with the sphere of binah, or understanding. Binah is located at the top of what is called the restrictive, or structural, side of the Tree, suggesting that time is connected to restrictions, discipline, persistence and patience. We already know that time is a difficult energy to handle. Interestingly enough, this sphere is also called Ima – Mother. It is time that allows us to see how much we have developed and grown. Because of time we can reflect upon our lives and say: "I have improved so much in the past three years." Through pressure over time, the coal becomes a diamond. Time helps us heal; there is no greater healing force in nature. Time and age also soften us; they make us wiser.

Time allows us to reflect back and understand what we have done and integrate the knowledge into our lives. Time is a dance between the soul and the body, a dance that has a rhythm (the days, seasons, year) and a melody (our memories).

Right opposite the sphere of binah is the sphere chochmah, or wisdom. This sphere is also called Abba – Father. (The word "abbot" in Latin and English comes form this Hebrew word.) Wisdom is located at the top of the "expansion" side of the Tree. Wisdom expands us, but it is useless without the discipline of understanding. So the organization of the Tree is telling us we all need a Father (wisdom) and a Mother (understanding) to be complete. We must allow time to change our body, mind and spirit in order to be wise and complete. Thus the evidence of time on our bodies is actually a sign of wisdom.

The Tree also associates each sphere with an organ of the body, allowing us to fathom a connection between body and spirit. Understanding and binah occupy the left hemisphere of our brain, while the right hemisphere is connected to wisdom, chochmah. Recent scientific studies have shown that the right hemisphere controls our sense of self and identity. This has been common knowledge in Kabbalah for millennia. Our identity is provided by our Father (Wisdom); biologically our gender is determined by our father, and also we assume our father's last name, and that last name gives us our identity. Father is the code name of wisdom, and wisdom is represented in the sphere of the right hemisphere, the sphere of identity. (It is always beautiful to see how science and mysticism walk hand in hand)

The Crown of the Tree of Life, its topmost sphere and associated with the will of God, is located just between and above wisdom and understanding, connecting the two. In our brain, the Crown is called the corpus callosum, and it is the structure that makes a path between the right and left sides of the brain. People who balance their right hemisphere (spiritual, imaginative and spatial information) and left hemisphere (words, language) in their daily lives have a better chance of understanding and being wise about the will of God. These individuals do not have to work so hard to attain their goals; they simply follow God's will and make it their own.

But any of us can put wisdom and understanding together. We need only work on the relationship between our "father" (wisdom) and our "mother" (understanding). That is why the Sefer Yetzirah tells us to be wise with understanding and to understand wisdom. Of course, this takes... time!

An example of how this works is in the experience of abused children. As children, they are terrified by their abuser's power and their own dependency. But in time, the abuser grows old and weak, while the frightened victim grows into a powerful adult. Now healing is possible. Age and time strip the abuser of his powers and give them to the victim. With time, love and mercy can transform anger into forgiveness, hate into understanding, pain into wisdom.

So next time you detect another wrinkle or notice another silver hair, look at it as a sign that you are getting one step closer to attaining Wisdom and Understanding. And whatever your age is, know this: There is always someone older than you are out there, more wrinkled than you will ever be, and that is God.

Up Syndrome

by Danielle Magady

I am Danielle. I am ten years old. I go to Yeshiva Ohr Eliyahu and I am in fourth grade. I have Down Syndrome. I have tons of friends. I like to play ball, go on the rings and play foursquare.

At my school we learn about history and we learn about mitzvot. One of the mitzvot I learned was we should honor our parents.

That means we should take good care of them. We should help them - like putting away the toys and setting the table. I am good at stirring the matzoh ball mix.

You should love your mom and dad even when you get angry. I cuddle with them and give them hugs. You could make presents for them.

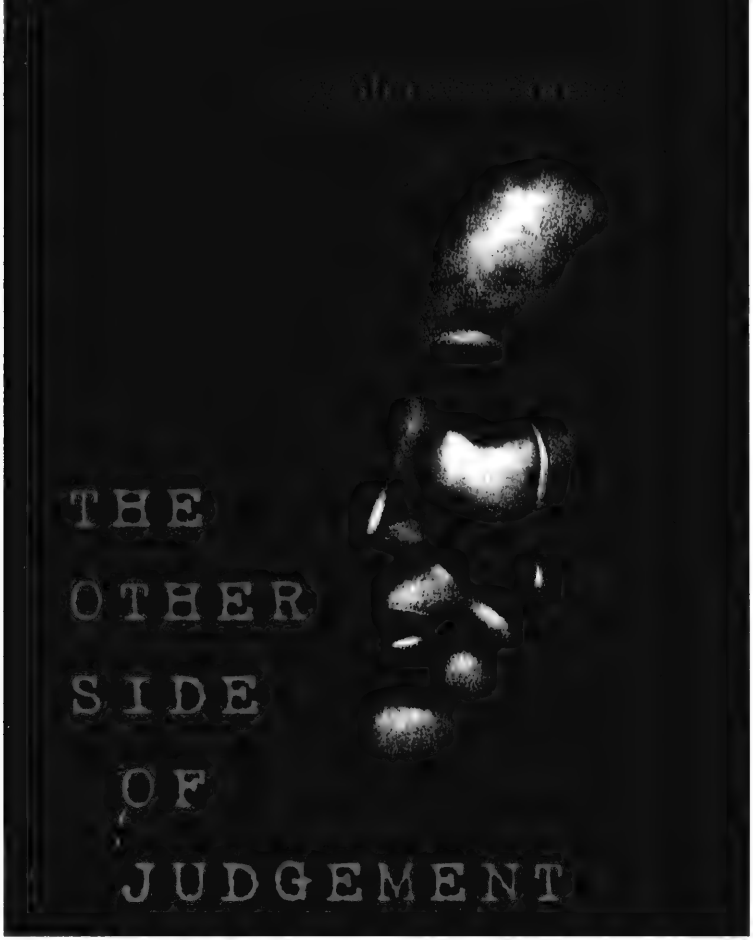
When I get up really early on Shabbos morning, I read books on the couch with my pillow and blanket so that my parents can sleep.

There are lots of things that I appreciate about my parents. I thank my dad for helping me with my spelling and for taking me on special dates. I thank my mom for helping me with my Hebrew tests and my book reports and baking Chanukah cookies with me.

You can honor your parents if you listen to them. You should not argue with them. Obey them even when they tell you to stop playing games. And you should not get too upset in arguments.

I take care of my mommy and daddy and they take care of me.

Danielle Magady is part of the inclusion program of the Etta Israel Center in Los Angeles.



My parents divorced when I was 8 years old. At the time, we were living in Los Angeles, which is where my father stayed while my mother, my three siblings and I all moved to Miami. The transition was hard. The six of us lived in a one-bedroom apartment, and my mother worked long hours to support us. My father and I were separated by 3500 miles and much emotional baggage. I missed him terribly and blamed my parents in general, but my father in particular, for visiting this unnecessary pain on me in those tender years. I had a hard time adjusting to school in a new city and felt stigmatized by the divorce. The pain of it stayed with me long into my adult years and it became a defining event of my life.

But in the end, I became close with my father once again. Several factors contributed to this closeness, but none was as important as this simple fact: I refused to judge him. One of the most beautiful rabbinical teachings proclaims, "Never judge a man until you are in his place." Or as Atticus Finch put it in To Kill a Mockingbird, "You can't really understand a person until you walk around a bit in his shoes."

When I grew up, I tried to walk around in my father's shoes. Sometimes I would recall my uncles' memories of him. They remember a 10-year-old boy who left the house in Iran at dawn, staggering under the weight of 100 pounds of carpets that he carried on his back to market so he could help support his many younger siblings. He would return late at night, so hungry that he would eat soup right out of the pot. They remember a boy who, when the family moved to Israel, would again work from the crack of dawn to late at night, selling goods to help the family. To fend off the exhaustion, he would take the scissors he used to cut fabric and poke his legs, sometimes even allowing blood to flow, just to stay awake so he could keep on working. When I asked him about this story my father would not go into details. But he lifted his eyes and said, "The important thing is that I never missed that market. Never."

And there were the stories of people who knew my father after we moved away. For years, they say, he walked around emotionally distraught at being so far from his children. In my youthful ignorance, I had thought he did not miss us as much as we missed him.

It has become normal today for children to judge their parents and to hold them accountable for all the love or attention that they did not receive. So few ever make the effort to walk in their shoes. But after a while, as caught up as I was in what I perceived to be my own suffering, I began to understand that I could never fully appreciate my father's suffering. When I did, it was the first step toward my really becoming a son. The second step was when I started to recognize aspects of my father in myself.

Last year I was away from home on business longer than I had ever been before. When I was into my third week on the road, I called my wife Debbie and asked her to put the kids on the phone. All my girls came running. "How are you Tatti? Are you having a good time?" Then I asked for my 6-year-old son. He wouldn't come. He was playing on his computer.

When my wife finally pried him away from the monitor and persuaded him to talk to his father, the talk was perfunctory and empty. It struck me that my son was learning how to occupy himself in light of a father who constantly traveled. He was learning to live without me. His computer was supplanting my affections as his principal companion. I honestly felt a pain that I have rarely experienced. Nothing, absolutely nothing, had hurt so much.

I called back. Again my wife forced him to the phone. "Tatti, I'll speak to you when you get back – that is, if you ever get back," my son said.

I could barely think. Of course, I would have to change. But even more strongly, I was wanting my son to understand – to know that even if I was absolutely wrong for neglecting him, at least in my mind I was doing it all for him and his sisters; I was trying to earn money so that I could provide for them in a respectable manner.

But I knew that he couldn't understand, not yet. And I knew his indifference towards me was the same indifference that I had sometimes shown my own father who was far away. And suddenly, I knew how much suffering I had caused that special man.

John Patton said that at the core of forgiveness is the discovery that the injured person can commit the same wrong as the perpetrator. It has been easy for me to forgive my father now. One day when my own son looks back on his childhood, I hope he will do so the same. I hope he will understand that his very imperfect father loved him and tried, in spite of his own flaws, to be a good parent, but that his father's only act of perfection was having him as a son.

When I was 12 we moved from Williamsburg, Brooklyn, to a suburb out on Long Island. The next morning I got up really early and went looking for the center in the neighborhood, maybe a candy store like Shapiro's back at home. Shapiro's was information central. Every one was welcome – my grandparents' generation, my parents' generation, my generation. We all lived in the neighborhood and we all belonged in the candy store.

I never found it. There was no place like it there. I wandered around looking – I even found a candy store, but it was an ambient place where nobody stopped long enough to get to know anybody. I adjusted to my new town, but part of me was lost because the community had no center.

Maybe that's why I understood the depth of my grandmother's exile from her own life when I saw her in a nursing home in the late '60s. Until then, she had been the matriarch of a large and bustling family. In Williamsburg she was the anchor of the first floor of an old brownstone with all of us aunts, uncles and cousins living up above – the whole neighborhood was set up that way, in multigenerational houses. I spent countless hours sitting in the rocker in Grandma's room as she translated stories from the Yiddish-language Daily Forvarts and gave over her commentary. Each night all her children and grandchildren gathered to watch the new TV we had chipped in to buy and put in Grandma's apartment, and my mother would bring down the halvah and Aunt Tessie would bring down the fruit. And then for the holidays everyone went downstairs and it all revolved around Grandma and Grandpa, and then after Grandpa died, just Grandma and the rest of us together.

I learned later that Grandma wasn't always the easiest person, but that didn't matter because her role transcended the difficulty; there was an overlooking of it, we didn't dwell on it. Because Grandma was on the first floor, the whole organizational structure of the household depended on it. Shapiro's was the center of the neighborhood, and Grandma's was the center of the family. On the sidewalks outside, one generation grew up into the next, and brides you'd known as babies soon came out to push the carriages you'd seen them ride in. It was a fabric that provided an intergenerational framework for everybody's role, and everybody's worth.

When urban renewal scattered the family, Grandma was the big loser. Without a home of her own, she ultimately wandered from adult child to adult child until she ended up in the nursing home where she was the center of nothing. No one knew her. No one sought to be connected to her. She lay in her bed, one meaningless day yielding to the next. With no future to look forward to, she dwelled with bitterness and longing on the past, which brought her to a dire isolation that no one deserves.

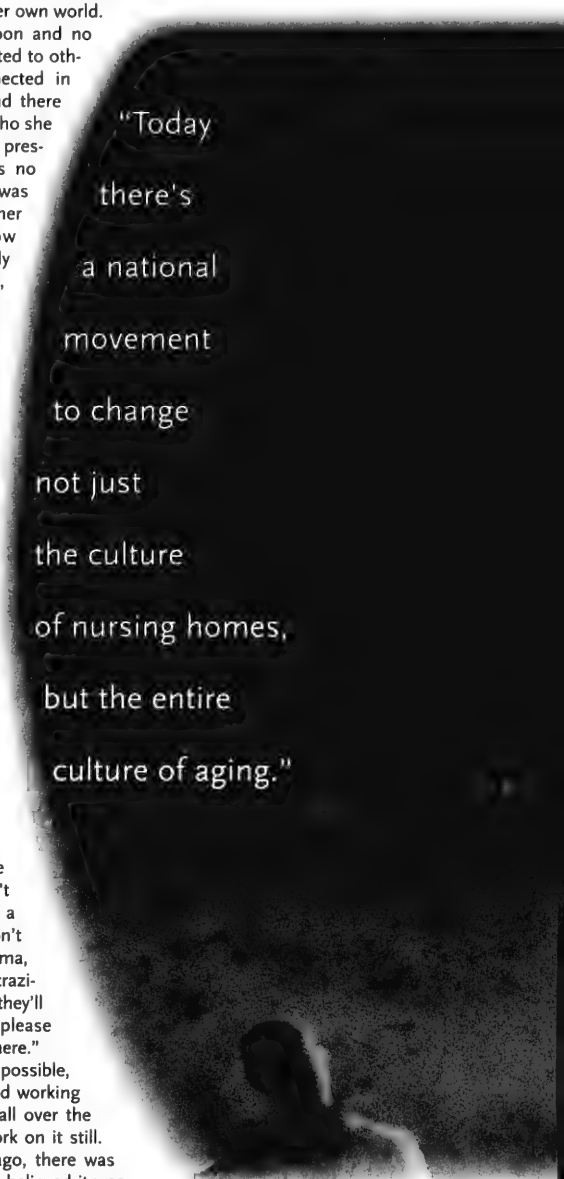
The nursing home stank of disinfectant and the whole place felt lifeless. Jails I had visited were far more alive. The lady in the next bed had her wrists tied; her eyes were glazed over. Each elder was in her own bed, three or four to a room, in her own world. Three o'clock in the afternoon and no one was up, out and connected to others. Grandma was disconnected in time from who she was, and there was no sense of a future of who she would be, and therefore the present was tenuous; there was no real present tense. There was nothing in her life that gave her any meaning. This is now referred to as "institutionally driven disease" – thinking, when you're institutionalized, only of your illness and everything that's wrong.

For the people who worked in the home, Grandma existed in terms of task and function: feeding her, changing her, making her bed, answering her call light – and for the most part they didn't want to be too bothered with that either. Grandma had become a thing in storage, which hopefully wouldn't need too much attention until it's time to be shipped out. There was no presiding kitchen, no street crowded with young mothers you'd watched grow up, no five-and-dime and no candy store where she could be with friends and find herself.

The last time I saw her, she said, "Barry, you just don't know how bad it is." I was a '60s activist and I said, "Don't worry about a thing, Grandma, I'll go fix it." I really had this craziness – I'll go tell them and they'll change. She said, "Barry, please don't, you don't have to live here."

But change was possible, is possible, and a few years later I started working on it, and now many of us all over the United States are hard at work on it still. When we started 25 years ago, there was just a handful of people who believed it was possible. Today there's a national movement to change not just the culture of nursing homes but the entire culture of aging.

We started in 1977 with the Live Oak Institute, a kind of think-and-do tank that launched a pilot program in one nursing home. Then in 1986 my wife Debby and I, with backing from 21 people who believed in our mission, acquired what we named the Live Oak Living Center, a small, plain, elder care facility in El Sobrante, California, outside Oakland. That was the beginning of our biggest experiment, and we are still hard at work on it today.



The very first thing we did is probably still the most important: we drew an "X" in time and space, and said that at the same time every day and in the same place we're going to get together and weave a community. It's called the community meeting, and it's kind of like Shapiro's candy store.

LOOKING FOR THE CANDY STORE

by Barry Barkan

It lasts for one hour every day. We introduce new people, tell jokes, exercise, talk about how everyone is, talk about the home and talk about the news. Everything that's going on in the world is a topic of discussion. New staff members come and introduce themselves, and it's an instant orientation for them that there's something different happening here from the last place where they worked. During the presidential scandal we talked about it every day, so much so that when President Clinton admitted that he had lied, some of the women cried, because they had so thoroughly believed his story. They are connected to life.

The elders also tell us what kind of things they want to have happen in their care. Each day they're recognized, in sponstaneous and different ways. And when someone dies, they're remembered – this gives meaning to their lives, because the traditional way of dealing with death at a nursing home is not to talk about it. This is inconceivable to us but it is normal practice in many other places.

The idea is to so thoroughly infuse the nursing home environment with normal life that the transition between the home and the outside world is seamless. Our staff members are encouraged to bring their kids to work, and there is a pretty constant presence of children of various ages, and reflecting the diversity of the staff. There are more during vacations, but even during the school year we have three or four kids most days, coming in and doing their school work, playing with one another and interacting with the residents. One 17-year-old girl who's been coming for more than 10 years grew up here. There was one old woman who was terribly unhappy and the girl befriended her and brought her out of her shell. Then one day, the woman made a racial comment, and the girl said, "Do you know you're talking about me?" And the woman said, "Gee, I never thought about that."

We also do old-fashioned consciousness-raising. We challenge the stereotypes of old age, and of life in a nursing home, and we bring to bear our own definition of an elder: "a person who is still growing, still learning, still with potential and whose life continues to have within it promise for and connection to the future. An Elder is still in pursuit of happiness, joy and pleasure and her or his birthright to these remains intact. An Elder is a person who deserves respect and honor and whose work it is to synthesize wisdom from lifelong experience and formulate this into a legacy for future generations."

And we don't separate people according to illness and infirmity. This sometimes makes our marketing difficult because people who are well don't think they want to be with people who are sick. But we believe strongly that we're all one community and everyone is together.

One of these days I'd like to have a radio station, to keep the elders vital and to broadcast, literally, the life knowledge they have that the rest of us so badly need, whether we choose to listen or not! I want to add a kitchen and a woodshop. And I'd like to have animals here. The health effect of pets has been well documented – it's all part of making the world of the elder a real world, a place where a real person can live and grow.

We have our dreams, and we've also had our dreams come true. In 1987 there was a major change in federal law that forced nursing homes to switch from a model of measuring physical health alone to regarding the resident as a whole person. Now there is a Residents Bill of Rights, which includes the right to privacy and the right to refuse medication – in other words, to be like anyone else in America. We are weighed down with paperwork, the everyday heroes who do the hands-on work are still paid a poverty-level wage, and inadequate funding threatens our immediate existence as well as the whole long-term care infrastructure and the old age of our parents and us all. Still, nursing homes are better today than they ever were.

I thought that I'd be through with nursing homes in three years, that fixing them would be so easy and so obvious that I'd move on to the next thing that would help bring back the world of my grandmother. That would be to develop an elders' guild. There needs to be a way for this generation of us who are going to be elders soon to consciously prepare for it, to attain through rituals and rites of passage a clearly defined role that can pass on a legacy that heals the generations. The Elders Guild would create a community without walls – workshops, seminars, handbooks and a repository of the wisdom and consciousness of the elders. It would guide and support a new reality of aging for generations to come.

I haven't been able to make that happen yet, but already we have succeeded in providing thousands of elders with a life that my grandmother had no hope of obtaining in her final months. The legacy of the candy store and the community that was centered in it may yet provide us all with an old age in which every one knows our name, and life's meaning comes from a continuing enhancement of our connections to one another.

From A to Ziman

by Joelle Keene

Richard Ziman sits behind his desk sipping a Perrier, but the casual picture is misleading. From his glass-lined office overlooking Brentwood, Santa Monica and the Pacific Ocean beyond, Ziman oversees an empire of Southern California real estate – and an equally impressive resume of philanthropy.

"I remember going with my father when I was 7 or 8 years old – he would go to these guys and ask them for money," recalls the chairman of the board and CEO of Arden Realty, Inc., which owns and operates more than 140 office properties containing about 20 million rentable square feet.

When the synagogue in their town of Williamsport, Pa., needed a new home, Ziman's father donated all of the lumber, and some of the money as well. For his son, it was the beginning of an education in the importance of giving back.

"He would use his own example for giving," Ziman explains. "He said, 'If you don't set the example yourself, how can you ever ask anybody else?'"

Ziman himself has done the same thing, using his prominence to advance a wide range of causes. He and his wife, Daphna Edwards, have endowed the Ziman Family Outpatient Oncology Center at City of Hope National Medical Center; the Ziman Family Synagogue and the Senior Acute Care Center, both at the Jewish Home for the Aging; and the Ziman Family Wing at the International School of Hebrew University in Jerusalem.

On a personal level, Ziman has served as Chairman of the Board of City of Hope National Medical Center and its Beckman Research Institute for six years, and held leadership posts with the Council of Entrepreneurs of UCLA's business school, the Los Angeles region of State of Israel Bonds, and Gov. Gray Davis's Commission for the 21st Century, among others.

His current passion, growing out of his presidency of L.A.'s Guardians Jewish Home for the Aging, is co-chairing a $72 million "Keeping the Promise" capital campaign to secure the future of two senior citizen facilities in Reseda, in the heart of L.A.'s San Fernando Valley. They've been battered by time – Ziman calls the homes "aging desperados" – and also earthquakes, the expense of new fire and seismic requirements and general financial stress. He is determined to raise enough money for them to have state-of-the-art new buildings with enough left over to fund an endowment. They've found about a third of it so far.

"Unfortunately, most people think the elderly are the responsibility of the government, as opposed to the responsibility of the children and the community," Ziman says. "They are our responsibility.

"If you think about it, an older person is even harder to care for than a newborn. As you get older it becomes more difficult to eat, to sleep, to wake up, to walk – everything is harder. You keep adding doctors. You never take away any."

He considers the Guardians residents his "751 parents". But he's still close with his mother, too, including her in family trips. His father died in 1994.

"My father grew up not really knowing his own father," Ziman says. "My grandfather died when my father was only 6. My father used to say to me, 'I never learned to be a good father or a bad father, because I never had a father to learn from. So I'm trying my best.' And he did. He coached my basketball team, even though he was clueless about the game, because we desperately needed a coach."

Like father, like son – Richard Ziman coached little league, soccer and T-ball when his older children were growing up. His wife is a producer, director and writer who is founding Chairwoman of Children's Uniting Nations, an international children's rights organization.

"There are a lot of people around who can do the cultural stuff," says the lawyer-turned-CEO whose company is listed on the New York Stock Exchange. "Who's gonna do the Jewish Home for the Aging?"

Back in his office overlooking the hillsides, on a prominent window ledge is a large photo of a man who seems to be Ziman's father. He's not, but Ziman explains... the man is Arthur Gilbert, the world-renowned art collector, and Ziman speaks of him with a warmth befitting a son. Over a period of years, the two men have become close.

"After my father passed away, Arthur told me, 'You better take good care of me. I'm the last father you'll ever have.'"

But Richard Ziman takes good care of all his "fathers". Maybe that's why he's had so many.

OLAM goes on a "Tour for Joy"

On March 8, OLAM teamed up with the Chai Center and the Happy Minyan and drew over 1,000 revelers to its Purim Bash at the Writers Guild in L.A. In that same Purim spirit, Tova and Shanni Chaya Suissa led a group of 45 kids to Tova's birthday Mitzvah Party at the Westwood Horizons retirement home, where they handed out mishloach manot and brought joy and beautiful songs to a very grateful audience.

A week later, OLAM entertained 1,500 Golden Agers on its one-week "Tour for Joy" of the East Coast. The Tour featured the rising star of Jewish music, the Neshama Carlebach Band (pictured above), led by the soulful music of Neshama Carlebach and featuring gifted band members Jake Jacobs (also the producer), David Morgan, Brian Glassman, Matt Gurman and Greg Wall.

The band, whose new album "I Am Yours" comes out in June, performed in 14 homes for the elderly over a one-week period. "I doubt I've ever witnessed such a lively and responsive audience as we had that day," said Sharon Wolfe, director of JASA West Side Senior Center in New York.

This summer, OLAM launches its "Tour for Joy" on the West Coast with rabbi Michael Ozair and friends bringing spiritual joy to homeless shelters, elderly homes and drug-rehab centers.

Mystical Wednesdays are soaring

With an inspiring mix of mystical music, Kabbalah candles and Torah learning, OLAM's Mystical Wednesdays will make you soar towards a more spiritual Judaism.

You can live the experience with Rabbi Michael Ozair and his special guests every Wednesday night at 7:30 p.m. in the Gold Room of B'Nai David Judea Congregation, 8906 Pico, 2 blocks west of Robertson in LA. The experience is priceless, the admission is $8.

Palestinians skeptical of ceasefire

By DANNY RUBINSTEIN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Comment

The Palestinian public is not taking Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat's call for a ceasefire very seriously.

Despite his declaration that he was prepared for an "unconditional" immediate ceasefire, Arafat lost no time in adding various conditions, especially the resumption of negotiations and the implementation of the Mitchell Report's recommendations – in other words, a total freeze on all construction work in the settlements.

According to various members of the Palestinian leadership, Arafat is incapable right now of issuing any ceasefire order because, in theory at least, the agencies of the PA that he heads are not involved in the shootings or the violence directed against Israelis.

The Palestinians are arguing that the attacks on Israel fall into two separate categories. On the one hand, there is the fire directed at Israel Defence Force troops and at settlers on the West Bank and in the Gaza Strip, primarily by Tanzim activists in the Fatah movement. On the other hand, there are the terrorist attacks carried out within the State of Israel by extremists belonging to either Hamas or the Islamic Jihad.

With regard to the first category, Arafat still exerts influence because he is the head of Fatah; however, he has great trouble wielding that influence because – in the eyes of many Palestinians, many residents of the Arab states and even many countries around the world – the attacks on the IDF and the settlers in the territories are perceived as a legitimate struggle against an occupying power.

As far as Hamas and Islamic Jihad terrorist

The News in Brief

CANADA

Funds for Homeless

TORONTO — Thornhill Liberal MP Elinor Caplan, on behalf of Claudette Bradshaw, the federal government's point person on homelessness, has announced a grant of over $90,000 to the Out of Cold program run by several local houses of worship, including Temple Har Zion. The grant was part of over $300,000 in funding to 12 organizations in York Region that work to alleviate homelessness.

Taliban Edict

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Canada has called for the recent edict by Afghanistan's Taliban rulers forcing non-Muslims to wear yellow badges to be placed on the agenda at this summer's United Nations World Conference Against Racism.

Youth Fellow

DUNDAS, Ont. — Steven Buchalter, a Grade 10 student at Highland Secondary School and member of Temple Anshe Shalom in Hamilton, has been accepted into the Meitav Youth Fellowship for Jewish Leadership program. Buchalter will join 23 other North American Reform teens for a three-year program of Jewish learning and leadership training, including a semester of studying in Israel.

Bloom Inducted

TORONTO — David Bloom, outgoing chair and CEO of Shoppers Drug Mart Inc. will become the first inductee into the new Canadian Retail Hall of Fame at a lunch in his honour June 19.

Wins Appeal

SAINT JOHN — The New Brunswick Court of Appeal has overturned a lower court's finding of libel in a case involving a cartoon that depicted former teacher Malcolm Ross as a Nazi. The Appeal Court threw out a lower court decision that awarded $7,500 to Ross, and it ordered Ross to pay cartoonist Josh Beutel $5,000 in court costs. In 1998, Justice Paul Creaghan of the New Brunswick Court of Queen's Bench ruled that while Ross may be a racist, there was no evidence he was a Nazi or that his views derived from Nazism. The Court of Appeal ruled that Beutel's cartoon was fair comment and should not be taken literally.

Anti-Semitism Condemned

MOSCOW — The Moscow Helsinki Group, the oldest human rights organization in Russia, has adopted a resolution condemning anti-Semitism and other forms of xenophobia at its 25th anniversary meeting last week here.

The Resolution to Fight Xenophobia read:

"The participants of the international conference dedicated to the 25th anniversary of the Moscow Helsinki Group recognize the growth of anti-Semitic tendencies in Russian society in the past two to three years.

"Numerous incidents of the propaganda of inter-ethnic and religious intolerance and enmity by a number of deputies in both houses of the Russian parliament, governors, other officials, and in the press, and the use of xenophobia and anti-Semitism as a tactic in election campaigns are not being met with the needed resistance by federal structures and law enforcement agencies.

"We call on the President of the Russian Federation to uphold the ethnic and religious dignity of all citizens.

"We ask Russia's human rights organizations to increase the monitoring of all forms of xenophobia and anti-Semitism, and to widely publish this information both inside and outside the country and strive for the effective defense of victims of xenophobia and other types of ethnic or religious discrimination."

ISRAEL

Housing to Go On

JERUSALEM — Israel's housing minister says plans for new housing units in West Bank settlements are going ahead, despite international pressure for a construction freeze and hints that the government might compromise on the divisive issue. Natan Sharansky told Israel Radio last week he had approved construction bids for 496 new units in Ma'aleh Adumim and 217 units in Alfei Menashe.

WORLD

Monument Inscription

WARSAW — The inscription for a new monument to Jews massacred in the Polish town of Jedwabne in 1941 will stop short of saying that Poles, not Nazi troops, did the killing. The inscription, released last week, alludes to the horrors of neighbours killing neighbours and warns that hatred should never again "set the residents of this land against each other." A Polish official acknowledged the text is a compromise that won't satisfy everyone, especially some Jewish groups. But he said he believes it "reflects current knowledge and emotions surrounding the issue."

Award to Canadian

NEW YORK — Noted Canadian cancer researcher and immunologist Dr. Chaim Roifman has been awarded the Israel Cancer Fund's prestigious Elliott Osserman Award for Distinguished Service in Support of Cancer Research. Roifman is a senior scientist at the Hospital for Sick Children, as well as professor of pediatrics and immunology at the University of Toronto.

Ecstasy Bust

PRAGUE — An Israeli man was among eight arrested in the Czech Republic for conspiring to smuggle 100,000 pills of the Ecstasy drug. The pills, with a street value of $2.5 million, were found last week at Prague airport in two suitcases destined for Canada.

CJC challenges McGuinty on school funding

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress has issued a spirited challenge to Dalton McGuinty, calling on the Ontario Liberal leader to clarify his stand on funding independent schools.

CJC threw down the gauntlet on the same day as large newspaper ads appeared featuring McGuinty and urging a stop to Bill 45, the government's controversial tax credit for parents of children in private and faith-based schools.

"Public money is meant for public education!" the Liberal party's ad proclaimed. "The government's plan to use your tax dollars to pay for private schools will harm our public education system.

"It's time to make them stop. It's time to make them face up to the damage that private school tax credits do… we can stop Bill 45 tax credits for private schools."

The ad carried a cut-out petition, to be mailed to the Ontario Liberal Party.

McGuinty fiercely opposes the measure. Some Liberal MPPs, including Monte Kwinter and Michael Bryant, both of whom represent heavily Jewish ridings, favour the credit.

Congress responded to the ad with two old quotes attributed to McGuinty. The first, made by the Liberal leader before the executive of CJC's Ontario region on Dec. 3, 1998, was: "I have no ideological opposition to ensuring public funds support Jewish day schools."

The second was printed in the May 16, 2001 edition of the Toronto Star: "I have said, in the past, that there is a fairness issue here [regarding the funding of independent schools] and that is something that we recognize."

With those quotes in mind, CJC Ontario region chair Ed Morgan said in a statement issued by CJC, "While it is clear that Mr. McGuinty does not favour tax credits as a means to fund independent schools, we challenge him today to be honest with the Ontario public.

"Mr. McGuinty: If you are not philosophically opposed to the funding of independent schools, if you believe that there is a fairness issue here, then tell the Ontario public your plan for solving this longstanding inequity.

"We challenge the Liberal Party of Ontario to put on the record their plans and their ideas for the funding of independent schools in the province of Ontario."

Congress adds that in its 1998 meeting with McGuinty, while the Liberal leader stressed his first priority is public education, it was the first time any provincial party leader had made a statement in support of funding independent schools.

Meantime, Jewish groups are looking forward to public hearings into Bill 45.

Queen's Park appeared to bow to public pressure last week by agreeing to hold limited hearings on the tax credit.

The government, however, made it clear it intends to pass Bill 45, likely before the summer recess begins at the end of this month, and said it's highly doubtful any hearings will be held outside Toronto.

Opposition leaders, including McGuinty, fumed that public input will be squelched.

He described the plan for hearings as "a sham." New Democrat House leader Peter Kormos denounced them "so brief as to be meaningless."

CJC has asked to appear before the hearings, to take place for about two weeks before a standing committee of the finance ministry. Congress will also represent the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools.

Also scheduled to appear is Jewish Parents for Equality in Education Funding (JPEEF).

"We're looking forward to it in order to clarify a lot of misrepresentations," said JPEEF president Robert Samery. "It will be an opportunity to tell our side of the story."

Congress, meantime, is continuing its meetings with officials of Ontario's finance ministry to work out the mechanical details of the tax credit.

Still unclear, said CJC's Simon Rosenblum, is how it will interact with existing charitable deductions, and how it will be applied to parents who do not pay full fees at Jewish day schools.

Also last week, the Ontario Alliance of Christian Schools announced it would mount a $500,000 ad campaign in favour of the measure.

The Sound of Music

From the editor's desk

During their study of the secrets of the heart, our ancient sages taught their pupils, "There are places that open only to music."

For some of us, they are places of memory, or of spirit, or of pleasure. For most of us, they are likely a combination of many different places. For all of us, however, music, in some form or other, is a communication of the soul.

Very early in the production of The Sound of Music, now on stage at the Stratford Festival of Canada, one is reminded of this.

The Sound of Music is about the nature of the connection between music and the soul. Of course the play does not, indeed cannot, explore this relationship to any real depth. Nor does it try to. It does, however, lay bare, in the unfolding drama of the story and in the occasionally inspiring and infectious sing-a-long of the melodies, the notion that in our music are implications and even possibilities far more significant than merely entertainment.

The opening, underlying proposition of the play is that "the hills are alive with the sound of music."

Like all worthwhile poetry, however, "hills" and "music" are of course meant to be understood both literally and metaphorically. The play's storyline, told primarily through song and only secondarily through dialogue, is the vehicle that helps bring us to that understanding.

It is a story that most of us know.

First put to music on Broadway more than 40 years ago, in 1959, it is based upon the true tale of the Trapp Family Singers, who fled from Nazi-occupied Austria before the start of World War II.

Maria Rainer, a postulant at Nonnberg Abbey, is sent to be the governess for the seven children of the widower, Captain Georg von Trapp. She loves the children; they love her. She falls in love with the captain; he falls in love with her.

As the captain tells Maria during that undeniably and inescapably transformative fraction of a moment when he realizes his love for her, she has "brought music back into [my] home." They marry.

The Nazis take over Austria. In their brutish, ugly way, they also aim to take over the captain's life. They conscript him and recommission him to command a ship in the German navy.

"You will take your orders from us," the Nazi thug bellows at the captain. And then, in the "language" of the play's underlying proposition, the Nazi observes revealingly, "We missed hearing you sing."

Of course, the point is that the Nazis do not allow others who wish not to be like they are, to "sing," nor would they understand the sound of the music, even they did.

In the very last scene of the play, the von Trapp family escapes from Austria and from the Nazis. Helping them is the Mother Abbess, whose last words to the family as it flees into the danger-laden night are a paraphrase of the promise made by the prophet Isaiah: "The mountains and the hills shall [once again] break forth in singing."

Those words, a promise to all mankind, neatly tie the play together in a ribbon of thematic unity: It is the deeply-held belief of decent human beings, indeed the deeply-felt need, that the "hills [must always be] alive with the sound of music."

The music in the play of course, reflects the post-war, early 50's optimism of the West. To some people today, the tunes and the lyrics sound "cheesy," which they criticize as being naively out of date.

Such criticism, however, is beside the point. The music's optimism is part of the playwrights' credo in the essential goodness and redeemability of mankind. And that is a belief that warrants emphasis. Moreover, most of the music is fun.

This is the first ever production of The Sound of Music at the Stratford Festival and the company is to be commended. I urge people to see it.

Cynthia Dale carries the show. She is an energetic, plucky, determined Maria, a commanding presence whenever on stage. Her timing, range of expressions and nuance of emotions are superb. But the joyful centerpiece of her performance is her singing: strong, assertive and confident. She meshes well with the children, whose harmony and musical abilities are also of a very high calibre.

Other key performances are delivered by Jeanne Lehman as the Mother Abbess. Her rendition of Climb Every Mountain is stirring.

Cory O'Brien as Rolf the delivery boy and aspiring Nazi shows a strong voice and deft dancing ability.

Raymond O'Neill as Max Detweiler, the captain's friend and Austrian government functionary, provides the perfect measure of Uriah Heep-like unctuousness and Sidney Carton-like courage to the role.

And, despite the limited scope of her role, Lally Cadeau, as Frau Schmidt, the housekeeper, brings out the maximum of its warmth and strength.

The play is essentially two mini-plays in one: music dominates the first part prior to the interlude; drama dominates the shorter second part, after the interlude. The transition between the pageantry of the wedding near the beginning of the second part, to the predicament of the Nazi takeover, is compellingly effective. Two long blood-red banners of the swastika, hanging from ceiling to floor, replace Austria's official colours after the wedding. The atmosphere is ominous and foreboding, a place of terrible memory.

Ironically, but significantly, that is another reason to see the play.

Larry's 'the King' at Israel Bonds 50th gala

TORONTO — Even over the phone, you can practically see the trademark suspenders and hunched shoulders.

And unlike so many other interviewers today, Larry King sounds like he actually enjoys being interviewed. Talking seems as natural for him as breathing.

Talk he has since 1960. With over 40,000 interviews under his belt, the eminence grise of the talk-TV format has probed presidents, prime ministers, artists, and actors, scientists and singers, earning the monicker of "the Muhammad Ali of the broadcast interview."

No matter who's on his nightly CNN show Larry King Live – the first worldwide phone-in TV talk show (and CNN's highest-rated program, with 230 million viewers in 212 countries) – King applies four criteria for a successful interview.

"It doesn't matter if it's a ballet dancer or a singer or a politician," King says. "First, there's got to be passion. The person has to be passionate about what they do. Second, they have to be able to explain what they do. Third, there's got to be a sense of humour, a self-deprecating joke or two, and fourth, it's good if they have a little attitude, a chip on their shoulder."

King was the featured speaker at last Sunday's gala dinner marking the 50th anniversary of State of Israel Bonds in Canada. The master interviewer was slated to show his stuff in a live chat with sex therapist Dr. Ruth Westheimer. Proceeds from the event will benefit the United Way and Jewish Family & Child Service (coverage will appear in next week's CJN).

Born Lawrence Harvey Ziegler 68 years ago in Brooklyn to Russian-Jewish immigrant parents, King was raised in a Yiddish environment before heading off to Miami, where, barely out of high school, he landed a storybook job: janitor at an AM radio station.

He eventually landed his own morning talk show in Miami, at the same time as doing TV commentary for Miami Dolphins football games. In 1978, he hit the network with Mutual Radio, with a show heard on 28 affiliates

Larry King Live debuted in 1985 on CNN, with its mix of celebrity interviews, political debates and topical chit-chat. In 1994, Mutual Radio began simulcasting the show.

Through the years, King has interviewed every U.S. president and first lady since Richard Nixon. Last year, his show tallied 37 consecutive days of coverage of the presidential election. Other highlights of 2000 were interviews with the Dalai Lama, Bill Gates and Nelson Mandela.

Can King pull one interview out of the hat as his most memorable? That's a tough one, as he uncharacteristically pauses.

"I guess it would have to be Frank Sinatra," he says after considering a few others, including Eleanor Roosevelt, Martin Luther King and Malcolm X. "Sinatra was just the perfect guest. He was charming. He was passionate. He could put you on the stage."

How about an especially difficult interview? The late actor Robert Mitchum springs to King's mind.

"He was unresponsive… just one-word answers to everything. He drove me nuts. But as an actor, I think he was putting me on. I liked him. I mean, here was someone who wouldn't a return a call from the New York Times. That's pretty cool."

Larry King

How about someone King would love to have on, but hasn't been able to?

"The Pope, for sure. Forget your religious feelings. He grew up mostly in a Jewish community. He lived under Hitler and Stalin. He's very conservative religiously, but socially liberal. He was shot, and went and kissed the guy who shot him! We almost got him once, but now, he's very frail."

King has interviewed just about every major Jewish celebrity in the United States, as well as every Israeli leader since Golda Meir (except for Ehud Barak). Yasser Arafat has been on as well. Asked why the former U.S. vice-presidential candidate seemed to take his defeat so well, King replied, "Joe Lieberman's a special guy. He never appeared hurt or down. I'm gonna ask him why."

His favourite guests are comedians, particularly the old borscht belt mainstays, such as Don Rickles and Mel Brooks. "I love to laugh," he says.

He could do without some of the more tabloid-styled shows, such as having psychics on the air. "It's not my cup of tea, but I understand the need for it. I'm an entertainer. I understand that. I actually like the diversity, of having the president on one night, and a screen star the next. It's part of the weird life I lead."

King, who has suffered a number of life-threatening heart attacks, chairs the Larry King Cardiac Foundation, which gives out grants to help pay costs for individuals suffering from heart disease. He's also found time to author 11 books.

It's simple curiosity that drives him. "The one thing I've never lost is my curiosity. I'm still curious about everything. I'm curious about you. I'm curious about The Canadian Jewish News. Is it published in Yiddish or Hebrew?"

Would he do it all over again? Surprisingly, no.

"I'd much rather play second base for the New York Mets, and hit .280 lifetime. I'd take that over this career. But I never dreamed I would have this career."

King dismisses criticism of his style as too soft. "I didn't go on the air to promote fist-fights," he says. "That's not my style. I ask questions. I ask good questions."

Former Torontonian heads new media watchdog

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A relative newcomer among media watch organizations focusing on coverage of Israel and the Middle East, Media Watch International (MWI) is headed in New York by Toronto-born Sharon Tzur, who served as a Herut-Likud shlichah here in the mid-1990s.

At the time, she was studying public policy at York University while working to revitalize Herut-Likud's youth wing (Betar) and organize a Toronto chapter of Tagar, a branch for university students.

Tzur, now 28, eventually continued her studies at New York University, but still hasn't completed them. She's been too busy working – a year in Israel as a fundraiser for Tel Aviv Mayor Roni Milo, then a stint with the fledgling American Friends of Likud (part of the reason she left Israel – a combination of love and a good opportunity, she said), and most recently as national director of project development for the Jewish National Fund.

Sharon Tzur

Her position as director of MWI and its New York office gives Tzur the opportunity to "do everyday what I love doing," she said during a recent visit to Toronto.

"Our purpose is to ensure accurate and impartial reporting on the situation in the Middle East, and in particular Israel," she said. Although Tzur doesn't believe the media in general are anti-Israel or anti-Semitic, she thinks Israel's "not getting a fair deal."

Part of the reason, she believes, is that reporters may not have time to check facts. "I also think that the Palestinian Authority is very, very good at PR," she said.

"A lot of the photographers who work for the foreign press in Israel are Arab. I don't want to say they're biased...but in Israel everything is open, and in the Palestinian Authority, there's very much a lid on what's released to the media."

According to MWI's Jerusalem-run Web site (www.HonestReporting.com), which was set up in October, the non-profit organization, with offices in England and Israel as well as New York, has 12,000 subscribers. The number is actually closer to 15,000, said Tzur. In the past two months, about 300 to 400 new subscribers a week have signed on, with one member lost for every six new ones added.

MWI, which began with seed money from the Jerusalem Fund of Aish HaTorah, is now privately funded. The Web site, in a more modest form, was the brainchild of two Jewish university students in England, who are still involved with MWI.

With 12 employees worldwide, staffers monitor newswire output, as well as about two dozen publications online. Members also send material from their local media – 20 to 50 items a day. In fact, with her parents and brother still living in Toronto, Tzur – whose late grandfather, Zionist Revisionist Zvi Rosenblatt, was acquitted of the 1933 murder of Zionist labor movement leader Chaim Arlosoroff – jokes about having her own crew right here.

She prides herself on MWI's rapid response to problematic material. "Within hours, maximum half a day, our members have an e-mail." A typical e-mail explains why an article is biased and includes a sample protest letter, although members are urged to write their own polite, respectful response, Tzur said.

One item, according to Tzur, generated 3,000 e-mailed protests over a weekend, prompting the recipient to call her and ask her to "call off [her] troops," she said.

Canadian papers monitored include the Globe and Mail and Toronto Star, neither of which is as bad as their American counterparts, according to Tzur.

Of all the media, CNN is the worst, she said. She noted, however, that when MWI goes after them, "in many cases they do correct their errors."

In a 30-day analysis of CNN, which has not yet been released, MWI "found in every area the result is what you would call biased," said Tzur. As examples, she mentioned 92 Palestinian spokespeople to 61 Israelis, and more than twice as many photos of Arabs as victims, compared to Israelis, over the same time period

Although most of MWI's work is focused on bias in the media, a panel consisting of lay and staff members also takes note of accurate and balanced reporting, highlighting winners in the awards section of its Web site.

As well, MWI has arranged press conferences and puts out position papers on issues such as Israel's abducted soldiers and the "use and abuse of Palestinian children by Yasser Arafat and the Palestinian Authority.

"Our job is to educate the media," said Tzur, who praised other media watch organizations like CAMERA (The Committee for Accuracy in Middle East Reporting in America), and noted that MWI co-operates "with all of them.

Upcoming plans include the opening of a Spanish-language bureau in Buenos Aires in co-operation with the local Israeli embassy.

"I wish that Diaspora Jews would be more involved," said Tzur. "But we are lucky that those who are committed and involved are so dedicated."

WALK FOR ISRAEL: The students and families of Leo Baeck Day School added their support to the Israel Fun Walk of UJA FEDERATION. Students carried the school banner for the entire 7 km, and at one of the checkpoints, posed in front of the banner made by grade 3 and 6 students. The banner was titled, Israel Blooms Peace. Toronto rabbi convicted in tax evasion scheme

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Toronto rabbi has been sentenced to a year of house arrest and must a pay of fine of $32,229, in a tax evasion scheme that issued false receipts in the names of three registered charities.

As well, Rabbi Leon Edery, 65, must perform 240 hours of community service, and is prohibited from taking part in any charity for a year.

Rabbi Edery had been charged with 48 violations of the Income Tax Act, but convicted on one that encompassed all the major accusations.

Court heard that under the scheme, which ran from 1992 to 1997, donors to three charities, two of which are synagogues, were issued tax receipts by Rabbi Edery. However, the receipts were for much higher amounts than the actual donations.

In 1995 alone, for example, the value of receipts issued was almost $1 million, while actual donations totalled $312,000.

Some receipts were also backdated so they could be submitted for the previous tax year.

The donations were paid to the Abarbanel Sephardic Learning Centre, Mincha Gedola Synagogue and Or Hamaarav Sephardic Congregation. Rabbi Edery controlled all three, which were registered charities, from his North York home.

In 1986, however, Or Hamaarav Congregation, in the Bathurst-Wilson area, was seized by its mortgage holder, Regional Trust Co. The congregation, which housed a synagogue and kosher day-care centre, was about $450,000 in debt and several months behind in mortgage payments.

Rabbi Edery and his late brother, Rabbi Abraham Edery, were signatories to the mortgage. The centre was eventually sold in a power of sale, with proceeds going to creditors. However, the head of the day care centre was never paid the $3,000 she was owed.

In the tax evasion scheme, the Crown had sought a six- to 12-month jail term. Only Rabbi Edery's age and poor health saved him from prison. "I think the community is better served by you being in it, rather than in jail," said Madam Justice Rebecca Shamai in passing sentence last week.

The rabbi will be allowed to leave his home only for religious functions, medical reasons and to perform his community service.

Evidence at his trial last month in the Superior Court of Justice showed Rabbi Edery attempted to evade paying some $64,000 in personal income taxes.

Rabbi Edery, who is not a member of either the Orthodox Vaad Harabanim or the Toronto Board of Rabbis, faces other tax evasion charges, and is scheduled to be back in court later this month.

Jacob Abecassis, 33, a tax preparer involved in the scheme, pleaded guilty to tax evasion last fall. He was fined $128,000 and sentenced to six months of house arrest.

Clinics planned for slave labour compensation

TORONTO — Demand by Holocaust survivors or their heirs for help in filling out slave labour compensation forms is so high that the community is holding more clinics.

Jewish Information Service (JIS) says an additional set of clinics is slated to be held every Tuesday and Wednesday from June 5 to Aug. 1. The clinics are by appointment only.

UJA FEDERATION has helped 3,000 Holocaust survivors in the Greater Toronto Area apply for slave labour compensation from the German government, the organization announced last week.

Between March and May of this year, 18 volunteers trained by JIS helped nearly 600 survivors complete their applications in person. In addition, JIS logged close to 2,500 phone calls from survivors or their families who were filling out their forms at home.

According to JIS senior co-ordinator Barbara Barak, an estimated 7,000 to 8,000 Holocaust survivors live in Toronto, and many who qualify for slave labour compensation have yet to come forward.

In addition to the slave labour forms, which must be submitted by Aug. 11, several thousand survivors or their heirs are also eligible to apply for funds from dormant Swiss bank accounts. Applications for these are due by Aug. 3.

At a recent luncheon, volunteers described the emotional strains of having relived horrific Nazi-era experiences with the elderly survivors.

"The stories these people came in with were just incredible," recalled volunteer Mona Brown. "You wanted to cry, but you couldn't because these people had already been through so much. So I went home to cry."

"We were so blessed to work with these wonderful, dedicated, caring individuals. It was our volunteers who made these clinics such a tremendous success," said Barak.

To make an appointment with a clinic, call Jewish Information Service at 416-635-5600.

An especially evil, vile form of hatred

It is an especially evil, vile form of hatred that targets youngsters for slaughter. And yet, the slaughter of youngsters, it is now plain to see, has become the tactic of choice in the war against Israel by the inhumane, ruthless, fanatic haters of Israelis and Jews.

The latest such slaughter, at the hands of an Islamic Jihad suicide bomber last Friday night, cruelly ended the lives of 20 mostly teenage Israelis on the beach strip of Tel Aviv. It followed by some days upon suicide bombings, attempted suicide bombings and other attempted and "successful" methods of murder aimed at Israeli schoolchildren.

In response, Israel reacted forcefully but not militarily. It rightly placed the ultimate blame for the attack on the Palestinian Authority of Yasser Arafat, ended its unilateral ceasefire while reserving for itself the right to strike at the perpetrators of the murders, demanded that Arafat take immediate measures to end the Palestinian-initiated violence and also put into place the most severe economic and administrative strictures yet on the PA.

Some Western countries also reacted forcefully. Apparently surprised and even taken aback by the insistence and sharpness of tone of certain European expressions of outrage, Arafat issued a statement Saturday in both English and Arabic condemning the murders. It was Arafat's "bad luck" that the German foreign minister, Joschka Fischer, happened to be visiting the PA chairman on the day of the Tel Aviv murders. Reports circulated that Fischer threatened to withdraw German funding support to the PA, that he actually wrote the statement the unhappy chairman was forced to read.

But as with all of Arafat's past condemnatory statements or expressions of regret, there has always been a wide chasm between what he has said and what he has intended, between what he has told Western media and what he has actually done "in the field." As of this writing, the government of Israel is waiting to see what Arafat will actually do to bring an end to the violence.

Is it too naive to hope that the Western governments that denounced last Friday's atrocity are also waiting to see what practical steps Arafat will actually take to bring an end to the violence? Is it too naive to hope that perhaps this more vigorous reaction of the West may portend a change in approach to the present conflict?

Does the West finally understand the true nature and the full dimension of the fanatic hatred aimed at Israel? As history has countless times proven, the evil now directed at the Jewish state will soon come calling at Western states. Indeed, those evil forces have already attempted their first deadly forays against Western targets. In a real sense, therefore, Israel's battle against the fanatic foe it faces is also as an advance proxy on behalf of the West and Western values. History has also countless times proven there can be no compromise with this especially evil, vile form of hatred that targets youngsters for slaughter.

Private schools have saved taxes

Nowhere in any article I have read (including in The CJN, May 24) has there been any mention of the tax savings that users of the Jewish day school system have made possible for users of the general education system.

At present, 11,300 students are enrolled in Jewish schools at no cost to the Ontario taxpayer. If those who complain about the danger of offering a tax credit were to face the reality of having these children suddenly and en masse enrolled in the public system, they would be shocked. An extra $90.4 million dollars per year would be needed to fund these spots ($8,000 times 11,300 children).

The public school system, which gets the portion of municipal taxes that I pay every year whether or not my child is actually in the public system would now have to find extra money and build for the extra spaces in already overcrowded classrooms.

We urge all parents who have a child in a day- school system, be it Jewish, Muslim or Hindu, to approach their local board this summer and inform them of an intention to enrol. Faced with this massive shortfall, the Ministry of Education, and the politicians who stand behind it, elected or not, will be made aware of the value to the system of those families whose children are not in the public schools.

There go the parents' savings!

The recent statements of various Jewish organizations in Ontario in favour of Ontario's proposed tax credits for private schools, and their threats to actively oppose parties that do not support the move, will lead significant numbers of donors to Jewish causes to direct their funds elsewhere. My donations will go elsewhere if the agencies involved carry out their proposed electoral interference.

At a time when there will not be enough places in Ontario universities for high school graduates when the double cohort hits, because the government has not put the money up to hire much-needed faculty, what good will the private school credits do?

The money could have been directed toward hiring staff needed to teach the students whose parents will receive tax credits only to have to pay extra to send their children to universities out of the province or country. There go their savings!

Taliban follow tradition

World leaders and commentators have expressed disgust and condemnation at the Afghanistan Taliban's odious decree requiring Hindus to wear distinctive yellow badges to separate them from the Muslim majority.

Most have compared this travesty to the period of the Holocaust when the Nazis required Jews to wear a yellow star. It has been overlooked, however, that both the Nazis and the Taliban merely resurrected a centuries-past Muslim tradition.

The famous historian and biographer of Sir Winston Churchill, Sir Martin Gilbert, as well as other historians, have documented Muslim laws throughout the Middle East as far back as the ninth century, which required their Jewish citizens to wear such things as yellow patches, distinctive coloured turbans, ropes instead of belts, or odd coloured shoes to identify them as non-Muslims, dhimmis, against whom restriction and persecution were rife.

CJC plenary comments welcome

Borzykowski expresses a valid concern when he points out that there were no panellists from Western Canada in the session called Issues Facing Jewish Students on Campus. Several other students from the west present at the session raised the same point to me personally. While there were panellists from Montreal and Halifax, it certainly would have been beneficial to have a western voice. Proportional geographic representation, however, is always a challenge in our vast country and is not always perfectly achieved.

The Pope's silence

Pope John Paul's recent visit to Syria was supposed to be a solemn affair in line with his present attempt to reach out to the world's major religions.

Fifty thousand people, not only from Syria, but also from the neighbouring countries – Iraq, Jordan and Libya – gathered to participate in the mass the Pope conducted. The Pope's prayers, and message, in which he preached peace and unity, saying that religious differences should not serve as justification for violence, were transmitted on television. Who could object to these simple words uttered by a man, who has devoted his whole life to God's service? But here was Syria, the most brutal, oppressive and tyrannical regime in the region. The Syrian, European-educated president, Hafez Assad, unleashed his malicious, hateful rhetoric against Israel and all Jews of the past and the present. Where and when else would Assad gain the attention of the whole world?

The Pope's silence was deafening. Where was the outspoken critic of dictatorship and oppression, the guardian of world morality? It is easier to talk of peace and justice and apologize for the past, than to react to vicious outbreaks that villify a whole people, exposed throughout its existence to an unrestrained campaign of hatred and scapegoating.

The Canadian Jewish Historical Society and Saul Hayes' legacy

By ABRAHAM J. ARNOLD

The name of Saul Hayes received more attention at last week's (May 24-25) conference of the Association for Canadian Jewish Studies (ACJS) in Quebec City than it did at the Canadian Jewish Congress Plenary Assembly in Toronto (May 6-7), of which Hayes was the long time executive vice-president.

At the Plenary Assembly, Hayes' name came up briefly as Edgar Bronfman received the Saul Hayes Human Rights Medal. At the Laval University conference, his name featured prominently in the keynote address marking the 25th anniversary of the Canadian Jewish Historical Society (CJHS), as the ACJS was originally known.

The address disclosed that Hayes, before he died suddenly in January 1980, wrote what is described as his "last legacy to the Jewish community," namely, a "draft resolution on archives." The resolution had called upon Congress to "seriously consider a national campaign for funds specifically set up for the perpetuation of Jewish archives and history… to be sought by an appeal to individual and corporate donors."

In his resolution, Hayes spelled out in detail how the CJC should enhance Jewish archival endeavours. The national executive committee was to be "charged with implementing this resolution to the fullest extent" and CJC officers were called upon to make "quarterly progress reports" in the three years following the 1980 plenary session. The next plenary, in 1983, was to "review the progress made and determine whether additional programming of a similar nature [should] be undertaken."

Hayes envisioned "a foundation that would consider the desirability of, not only preserving Jewish history, but presenting Jewish history in the same way that it is presented in Beth Hatefutsoth, the Jewish Museum of the Diaspora" in Tel Aviv.

"Much of the work of Congress, though vital, is of a transitory nature, while its activities in the field of archives are of a lasting nature," Hayes wrote. "We would be unfair to future generations if we allow the archives program to be relegated to a lesser role."

The CJHS was inaugurated in 1976 at a conference at Laval University in Quebec City as part of the annual gathering of the "learned societies" of Canada. The society was established on the basis of a resolution adopted at the 1974 CJC Plenary Assembly in Montreal. The National Archives Committee (NAC), then chaired by Victor Sefton of Toronto, was mandated to implement this resolution and Sefton undertook the assignment with great vigour.

The NAC met in Montreal on Feb. 2, 1975 with representatives from Halifax, Quebec City, Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver. At the meeting, Hayes stated that the new society's purpose was "to stimulate, promote and organize research into the study of the history of the Jewish community; to collect, prepare and publish materials; to hold symposia on Jewish life and to erect exhibits."

He called for "a realistic budget" to be presented by Congress to the National Budgeting Conference (NBC), one, he said, which would contain "our financial tools for a national historical society and our national and regional archives committees.

"The intent is to increase the effectiveness of the provincial organizations through the central body."

At a later meeting in Toronto, called at Hayes' suggestion, Sefton expressed the hope for a national Jewish historical society "of at least the calibre of the American Jewish Historical Society."

Regrettably, the CJHS/ACJS, to date, has offered little aid to the "provincial organizations," nor has it achieved the status of the American society. This is due firstly, to very low funding, and secondly, to the fact that the AJHS maintains its own archives, which the CJHS cannot.

Sefton also proposed that the society should include "professional historians and gifted amateurs" but there was no question as to who came first – the amateurs!

Much of the impetus for a national JHS came from Winnipeg, where the Jewish Historical Society of Western Canada (JHSWC) was founded in 1968, after an archives collection was started a year earlier. Programs on western Canadian Jewish history, publications and a museum exhibit soon followed.

Harry Gutkin, the leading force behind the successful first effort at mounting a major Jewish museum exhibit (at the Manitoba Museum) – called Journey Into Our Heritage – wrote to Congress appealing for more support, not only for the western effort, but for the establishment of a national society.

A Jewish historical society, Gutkin urged, "can no longer be placed on a lower level than say, Jewish education, because a Jewish historical society has a vital role to play in adult education as well as education for the young." He called for "giving the Jewish historical society a proper place in the list of community priorities, nationally as well as locally."

When the first CJHS conference took place in 1976, active Jewish historical societies were already in place in Ottawa and Vancouver, as well as in Winnipeg, and other efforts were being started in Calgary, Edmonton, Halifax and elsewhere.

The first conference included an evening program at the synagogue followed by a day of sessions at the university, held jointly with the Canadian Historical Association (CHA); professional historians as well as amateurs participated.

An interim committee consisting of the chair of each existing Jewish history society was formed "to give form and substance to the present nebulous character of the society," as Hayes wrote to Sefton. While Sefton had been unable to attend the conference, there is no doubt that without his efforts, it would not have taken place.

The committee met in Winnipeg in October 1976 and among other things, approved a constitution, elected the first officers, made program plans for the 1977 CJC Plenary Assembly, discussed publications and fundraising, discussed relations with the Public Archives of Canada, as well as a joint meeting with the AJHS.

Officers elected were: Sefton, president; Hayes, honorary president; I. Wolch, vice-president, western region; Myer Freedman, vice-president, Pacific region; Evelyn Miller, vice-president, eastern region; Rabbi Jonathan Plaut, vice-president central region; Sid Green, treasurer; A. J. Arnold, secretary.

In 1975, Sefton had asked Congress for a $27,000 budget which was not approved; instead, he was granted certain small sums for meetings on an ad hoc basis.

Armed with the Winnipeg decisions, Sefton made a stronger presentation to the next meeting of the Congress national executive. The Jewish historical society is, he said, "an instrument of our survival which we must use to teach ourselves, our gentile neighbours, and above all our children and their children, who we are, what we are and why we are.

"Across this country, there has been Jewish settlement and input into almost every area and village, however remote."

As an example, Sefton cited his own work as an engineer "in new construction in Frobisher Bay on Baffin Island… [and] in the creation of the settlement of Sept-Îsles in Quebec."

Sefton also told Congress, "We plan to operate in as many directions as possible" including meeting annually with the learned societies, selecting "first class papers for presentation to this highly intellectual forum," publishing transactions and a newsletter, and encouraging publication of "first class histories of Jewish life in Canada" with assistance to authors.

Again he asked for $28,000, and again it was not granted, but he was "encouraged" to arrange for part-time help. For the 15 years Sefton served as president, he had to keep the society going on a bare-bones basis and it was only possible to move in one more of the "many directions" he had suggested, namely the establishment of the Canadian Jewish Historical Society Journal. (The journal was edited by Rabbi Jonathan Plaut until 1984, and then by Stephen Speisman until its last issue in the fall of 1988.)

At an NAC meeting in Toronto in March 1980, Rabbi Jonathan Plaut, who had also succeeded Sefton as national archives chair, reported that he had asked Congress for funds for archives cataloguing in all regions and for other needs based on information he had gathered from replies to a questionnaire sent to regional representatives. When Congress officers pleaded lack of funds, he asked for the opportunity to go across the country to attempt to raise funds himself.

Rabbi Jonathan Plaut also disclosed that at a Congress officers meeting in December 1979, Hayes had made an impassioned plea for archives and one unnamed officer had offered $10,000. Congress officers supported the cause, but with the caveat that if they were ordered to cut their budget, the archives budget would also be cut. This led Hayes to prepare his draft archives resolution soon before he died.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut, then president of CJC, also attended the March 1980 NAC meeting. He said that he had hoped some money would be raised for archives in memory of Hayes but "it did not now seem possible." He reluctantly concluded that unless funds could be raised from outside sources, it would be difficult to strengthen the archival program. He conceded that on the basis of funds available, "We cannot pretend that we are doing a good job. We are not. We are part of this country, and what we can do in co-operation with other institutions should be undertaken."

In the early '90s, when the CJHS started its own membership base, it changed its name to the Association for Canadian Jewish Studies and, beginning in 1993, acquired funding from the Social Science and Humanities Research Council for the publication of the Canadian Jewish Studies journal.

Visit to Curaçao (Part II)

In the early 17th century, a Dutch fleet, commanded by Johan Van Walbeeck, conquered Curaçao from the Spanish. Samuel Cohen, the first Jew to set foot on Curaçao, served the victorious fleet as an interpreter. A few years later, in 1651, the founders of Curaçao's present-day community arrived there. They numbered only 10 to 12 families, escapees from the oppression of the Inquisition in Spain and Portugal who had found a safe haven in Amsterdam. They were willing to travel to the ends of the world in further search of a new life, free to live and practise their religion in peace. Curaçao gave them this freedom. Today, 350 years later, the Jewish community that they founded continues to be active, comforted and nurtured by the political, social and religious freedom the Dutch have provided.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

My trip was a visit to the past. In our hemisphere, few other countries have occasion to celebrate this kind of historic dimension. I feel fortunate indeed to have made the trip and have shared the memories of the islanders. I wish that other congregations and Jewish communities, wherever they may be, might have something of the devotion and pride that are found in Curaçao, where Jewish loyalty can serve as an inspiration to many of us. These have been warm and lasting remembrances.

It was a privilege to share the community's anniversary. People attended en masse, and visitors came from everywhere to be part of this rare celebration. The community's congregation is affiliated with the Reconstructionist Movement, the liturgy of which has been adapted to its Sephardi tradition. It retains a special type of formality in dress (the chazzan wears a tricornered hat) and the respectful bowing of those given an aliyah.

In the early 17th and 18th centuries, the Curaçao community helped to establish several synagogues in North America, the Caribbean and Latin America. It supported the 13 colonies of the United States in their war against Great Britain and was one of the first countries of the world to recognize the newly declared United States. During World War II, Curaçao supplied the Allied forces with petroleum products refined on the island.

As noted in my previous column, the island's Jews feel right now that emigration threatens this future and they fight this with a strong commitment to their survival. They are indeed a stalwart group of men and women, who have inspired me with their devotion. Should your travel plans allow it, make a visit to Curaçao's Jewish community a priority.

A grim picture in Israel

Grim. That sums up the current security situation in Israel, the mood of the people and the prospects for the near future. I wish I could be a bit more upbeat but there's no sense in pretending. Sure, things could always be worse – and sadly, they probably will be.

Even by Israel's news-intense standards, recent weeks have been especially loaded with heart-wrenching headlines. Just when one felt as if the country had already hit rock bottom, sure enough it would suffer yet another new terrorist bombing, mortar attack or roadside shooting, to say nothing of the worst civil tragedy in Israel's history.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

How much depressing news can people endure? How much tragedy can one nation face without cracking? In the face of seemingly endless calamity, how can Israelis best deal with a crisis overload?

These questions came up during a recent conversation with friends. My wife and I had several people over for dinner, and in a remarkably short time, the discussion turned to ha-matzav (the situation).

Without exception, what each of our guests had to say was thoroughly depressing.

Like the rest of the country, all of us at the table were still reeling from the then latest terrorist outrage of the day before – a suicide bomber had detonated explosives strapped to his body at a crowded shopping centre in Netanya, killing five people and wounding many others.

During the conversation, one of our friends, a highly patriotic woman who was born and grew up in Jerusalem said: "For the first time in my life, I can understand those Israelis who decide to leave the country and live somewhere else because of the tough reality here."

It's a reality that imposes itself. In the two weeks since that dinner, there have been several more terrorist bombings, mortar firings and fatal shootings, in addition to the collapse of the Jerusalem wedding hall that killed 23 people.

Admittedly, crises and tragedy are nothing new for Israelis, whose devotion to their country has been tested like that of few others. But this time, it's different.

Like some untreatable cancer, the hostilities with the Palestinians seem to go from bad to worse. With each new week (day?), the bloodshed escalates further, defying any apparent military or political solution. It's a pure unadulterated mess, and a volatile one at that.

Since moving to Israel in 1990, I have seen the country weather all kinds of adversity. But what's happening today takes the cake for its impact on Israel's psychological condition. The malaise cuts deep and it's not hard to guess why.

First, the cold statistics which only tell part of the story. Since the Palestinian uprising erupted in late September, some 90 Israeli civilians and soldiers have been killed and hundreds wounded. On the Palestinian side, the numbers are far greater. The conflict may not yet be officially called a war but it certainly feels like one, especially with the country under siege, as people are afraid to take a bus or go to a shopping centre.

Compounding the anxiety is the gnawing sense of despair and disillusionment over the so-called peace process. Starting with Yasser Arafat's rejection of former prime minister Ehud Barak's far-reaching concessions last summer at Camp David through the Palestinian campaign of violence and hate-filled incitement against Israel, the past year has shattered any remaining hopes first raised by the Oslo accords in 1993.

Even if the country is not facing an existential threat, the sense of doom and gloom is pervasive. For all its military might and technological prowess, Israel is hurting. In addition to the casualties, the intifadah has skewered the country's economy, scared away tourists and led to sharp criticism of Israel by the international media and foreign governments.

It's a disturbing picture. Most unsettling is the perception that there is no imminent solution to the situation with the Palestinians. Lamentably, the country's leaders are no source of inspiration, reassurance or optimism for the future. Grim, grim, grim.

CNN's body count

The CNN presenter hurled one deadly challenge after another at Israeli Minister of Public Security Uzi Landau, before launching the most deadly weapon – the body count. While demonstrating an appalling ignorance of Middle East history, she had mastered the numbers. Over 500 Palestinians have died, she reminded Landau, as opposed to "only" a few dozen Israelis. Surely this proved that "excessive Israeli force" was to blame for this terrible human tragedy.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

According to this primitive concept of morality, justice requires an even body count. Therefore, whenever a Palestinian terrorist is killed in an Israeli response to eight months of deadly terror, an Israeli life should be sacrificed. In this warped universe, the murder of five more Israelis in a suicide bombing in Netanya would be seen as "fair."

No deep philosophical exploration is required to understand that the relative number of casualties is entirely unrelated to responsibility for aggression and violence. During World War II, far more German and Japanese civilians were killed in Allied air attacks than were American or British civilians, but only a fool or second-rate propagandist would use this statistic to shift the blame for aggression to the Allies.

The same relationship holds true in the current war between Israel and the Palestinians. Arafat and his cohorts are fully responsible for initiating this carnage, and the high number of Palestinian casualties, as well as the Israeli deaths and injuries from daily terror attacks, are entirely his responsibility.

Though every victim of this war, Israeli as well as Palestinian, is Arafat's responsibility, in the CNN version of morality, there is no difference between aggressor and defender, between attack and response. The only determinant is the number of dead bodies to be counted, filmed and fed to the masses between commercial breaks. If there are more dead Palestinians than dead Israelis, this must mean that Israel is guilty.

When challenged, spokespersons for the purveyors of 30-second morality hide behind the pretension that they are "only the messengers," protecting democratic values by providing unbiased information. However, the media's systematic collusion with the Palestinians is finally being exposed.

In a courageous article for the January edition of Commentary, Fiamma Nirenstein, who writes for the Italian daily, La Stampa, exposed the dirty secrets. Many of the journalists operating in the Palestinian Authority (PA) are sympathetic and more than willing to play according to Arafat's rules. After the lynching of two Israeli soldiers in Ramallah, the PA confiscated the films made by the journalists in the area. No one complained, and no sharp protests were lodged. One Italian crew from Mediaset managed to smuggle a film out of the area, and to avoid punishment for their sins, Ricardo Cristiano, from the state broadcasting service RAI, wrote a grovelling letter of apology to the PA, pledging to respect the "rules."

Hamas, the terror group that proudly took credit for the murder and injury caused by the Netanya suicide bombing, openly credits journalists for assisting the cause. Its Web site includes an account of a gathering that took place on May 6 in Gaza to honour journalists for their rare courage and daring in joining the struggle against the Zionist enemy. Faid Abu Shimalla, from the BBC Arabic Service, pledged to continue working shoulder-to-shoulder with the Palestinian people. Some balance. Some even-handedness.

The myths of Palestinian victimization and Israeli villainization extend to many international "humanitarian" organizations. Groups such as Human Rights Watch and Amnesty International publish unsubstantiated allegations presented by anonymous "witnesses" charging Israeli brutality. These tales are consistent with all the preconceptions, and this is enough to condemn Israel.

Morality is not decided on the basis of popularity, or on CNN's demand for a balanced body count, and this house of cards will eventually topple, and the pendulum will swing the other way. In this time, many people will be killed and injured. But as long as these distortions are repeated by diplomats, journalists and international organizations, the damage to the foundations of democracy and justice around the world will grow.

Desalination could solve Israel's water crisis

The news on Israel's water front is bad and getting worse.

The Sea of Galilee, a crucially important fresh water reserve, is at its lowest ebb in recorded history, and will drop even further during the summer.

Sheldon Kirshner in Israel

The coastal and mountain aquifers, another primary source, have reached precariously dangerous levels, compromising water quality.

Israeli farmers and industrialists face water quota cuts of 70 percent and 10 percent, respectively.

Amid reports that Israel is in the midst of a water crisis of unprecedented proportions, Israel's water commissioner has warned of severe shortages. Recently, the Water Commission's hydrology department disclosed that Israel faces a shortfall of 475 million cubic metres of water.

What to do?

On a short-term basis, Israel is trying to cope with a looming catastrophe by cutting back on consumption, by processing brackish water and sewage into potable drinkable water, by building more reservoirs and by importing fresh water from Turkey.

These methods, while sensible and practical at this juncture, may not be sufficient to tide Israel over as its population grows and demand for consumption increases.

The ultimate solution is probably seawater desalination, a fact the Israeli government now belatedly recognizes. Last month, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon announced that Israel would build major desalination plants in Ashkelon and Ashdod, capable of producing 50 million and 30 million cubic metres of fresh water per annum. They will not be ready for at least two years.

Currently, Israel consumes upwards of 1.8 billion cubic metres every year, using two-thirds for agricultural purposes and allocating the rest to industry and households.

Under its treaty obligations, however, Israel is committed to providing Jordan with 50 million cubic metres per year and the Palestinian Authority with 35 million cubic metres.

The Ashkelon and Ashdod facilities, which will each cost from $130 to $150 million (U.S.), are expected to be the first of a series of new desalination plants to be erected in Israel.

At present, Israel has one modest desalination plant in Eilat serving 20,000 residents. One of the most sophisticated and efficient plants of its kind, it produces 3.5 million cubic metres annually.

Until its construction about four years ago, Eilat converted brackish water into pure water and relied upon a network of local springs.

In addition to the Eilat facility, Israel maintains a plethora of much smaller desalination units for purifying brackish water.

By all accounts, Israel will require as few as 10 desalination plants or as many as 30 to meet its future requirements.

As far as David Waxman is concerned, Israel can only overcome its water crisis by building more desalination plants. "Our natural sources are deteriorating," said Waxman, president of IDE Technologies Ltd., Israel's largest manufacturer of seawater desalination plants. "Drought and increasing demand are simply aggravating the problem."

Waxman, whose Ra'anana-based company built the Eilat plant and has put in a bid to construct the proposed one in Ashkelon, has a strong financial incentive in such plants.

Ulterior motives notwithstanding, Waxman, born and bred in Israel, is firmly convinced that desalination is the key to resolving Israel's water problems, once and for all.

"The Israeli government doesn't have to make huge investments in desalination plants," said Waxman, lingering over a cup of coffee at a cafe in Ramat Aviv, a fashionable Tel Aviv suburb.

Under an approach known as BOOT (build, own, operate, transfer), private companies build and maintain a plant for 10 years, extracting profits from a water fee. At the end of this period, ownership of the plant reverts to the government.

In Waxman's estimation, it would cost Israel about $300 million a year to log on to such a system. "It's a relatively small sum."

Apart from ensuring Israel with a steady supply of water, BOOT would be financially feasible, generate employment, advance the march of technology, and protect the environment.

According to Waxman, Israel would be making a serious mistake buying water from Turkey, a close regional ally. "It's foolish to rely on external sources," he claimed. "And it's expensive."

In his view, the deal, under which Israel would import 50 million cubic metres from Turkey yearly, is based solely on diplomatic considerations.

"It's basically a political decision designed to tighten Israel's budding alliance with Turkey."

Waxman, whose company has installed more than 300 desalination and water treatment plants of various types in nearly 40 countries, said that Israel would be better off relying on desalination.

On April 23, IDE Technologies launched a $45 million state-of-the-art desalination plant in Larnaca, Cyprus. Scheduled to produce 18 million cubic metres, it was inaugurated in the presence of Cypriot President Glafcos Clerides and Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres.

IDE Technologies, founded in 1965 and controlled by the Ofer brothers and Dekel, is presently building desalination plants in Mexico, Spain, Chile, South Africa and the American Virgin Islands.

It builds facilities based on thermal and reverse osmosis technology. Most of its plants are of the thermal variety, but in recent years IDE has turned to reverse osmosis with increasing frequency.

In thermal plants, water is purified through heat, evaporation and condensation. Filtration is the modus operandi at reverse osmosis facilities.

The Cyprus plant is IDE's biggest undertaking to date, but in the future IDE will be able to build plants with a capacity of 50 million cubic metres, Waxman predicted.

The world's largest desalination plants, with an output of 100 million cubic millon metres a year, are in the Arab world, in countries such as Saudi Arabia and the Gulf states.

" For the Arabs, it's a matter of life and death," Waxman noted. They don't have any other water sources."

Although Israel is not in such dire straits, experts have warned that Israel's water crisis, exacerbated by inadequate rainfall last winter, will only get worse. Last month, the Water Management Committee said that Israel's fresh water reserves are insufficient.

The water level in the Sea of Galilee has dropped drastically. [Sheldon Kirshner photo]

Israel's main underground reservoirs, the coastal and mountain aquifers, have been damaged. Overpumping has already caused uncontrollable penetration of seawater into the aquifers. Shimon Tal, the water commissioner, said last year that, within a generation, the coastal aquifer will no longer be suitable for drinking or irrigation.

The Sea of Galilee is also under duress. The level of the lake is dropping at a rate of one centimetre a day, and is already 10 centimetres below the original red line of 213 metres below sea level. This means that Israel can draw only 87 million cubic metres this year, as opposed to 420 million cubic metres in a normal year.

The solution seems clear: Israel has no alternative but to construct more desalination plants to slake its insatiable craving for water.

And the sooner, the better.

Sad, but truthful commentary

Irreconcilable Differences? The Waning of the American Jewish Love Affair With Israel, by Steven T. Rosenthal, Brandeis University Press.

Books
Bernard Baskin

How deeply and strongly are North American Jews connected to Israel? Unfortunately, less and less. A 1998 poll conducted by the Los Angeles Times and the Israeli newspaper Yediot Achronot found that only 58 percent of American Jews felt close to Israel, a 17 percent decline within a decade, with an even greater fall in support among younger Jews.

The sociologist Steven Cohen found that for every ten-year drop in age, there is a five percent decline in support for Israel. The 1990 Council of Jewish Federation Population Study reveals that 31 percent of American Jews between the ages of eighteen and twenty-four reported no emotional attachment to Israel at all. As one Jewish professional observed, "The annual campaigns are being supported by older Jews for whom Israel holds a special place, but not by the next generation of Jews. For them Israel is not even on the map."

Why our love affair with Israel has gone awry is the concern of this illuminating, but disconcerting, book, by a professor of history at the University of Hartford. It examines the nature and development of American Jewish relations with Israel since Israel's birth in 1948.

The author maintains that the invasion of Lebanon, the Pollard spy case, the Palestinian intifadahs and the "who is a Jew?" controversy have transformed the American Jewish-Israeli relationship.

The generation that experienced the Holocaust and the birth of Israel is dying, Rosenthal states, and emotions, even of unparalleled horror and boundless ecstasy, lose potency over time Other demographic trends – the tremendous increase in intermarriage, the decline in Jewish education and the falling rate of religious observance – have all diminished the importance of Israel to the younger generation.

Rosenthal points out that Sephardi Jews, whose origins and sensibilities are Middle Eastern and who are becoming increasingly empowered in Israeli society, have little in common with the mass of American Jews. As bonds of family and shared cultural experience no longer assert much mutual attraction between Israeli and American Jews, the person-to-person contacts between the Israeli and the American communities appear to be quite tenuous. As a highly placed Jewish professional told Rosenthal, "When I go to Israel, I still have a sense of kinship, but Israelis increasingly seem like citizens of another country and another society. I see them as people that I care about, but that sense of mishpachah is fading, even for Jews like me who know about these things."

The assassination of Yitzhak Rabin was the most spectacular and appalling instance of the intolerance and conflict that affect every level of Israeli society. Despite American Jews' perception of Israel as a miniature version of America, the democratic virtues of tolerance, pluralism and respect for others are in short supply in Israeli political culture.

Rosenthal's presentation is even-handed, lucid and a valuable, if sad, contribution to popular understanding and debate. Somehow, a firm and enduring bridge must be re-established between Israel and North American Jewry for the mutual benefit, security and well being of both.

Friends of Yiddish celebrates group's 17th anniversary

By BEN ROSE
Special to CJN

TORONTO — "We are a voice in Toronto on behalf of Yiddish and we're here to stay," the president of Friends of Yiddish (FOY) said at the group's recent 17th anniversary dinner.

The membership has grown from 100 when Eda Zimler-Schiff first took over as president, to 250.

"We help people to become aware of the revival of Yiddish and give them an opportunity to speak the language," she said. "When there is a need for Yiddish we are ready to help, and we have entered into partnership with many other organizations in the community."

"Yiddish is the language of the people who perished in the Holocaust," said Sol Hermolin, program chair.

The next big FOY event is the Canadian debut of Mikveh, the female klezmer band, at Convocation Hall, Oct. 20. It features lead vocalist Adrienne Cooper of New York, long a favourite of Yiddishists, and violinist Alicia Svigals, Susan Sandler on trumpet, Nicki Parrott on double bass and accordionist Lauren Brody. Tickets are $25, $35 and $75, the last entitling the ticket-buyer to a tax receipt.

Proceeds will go to the Jewish studies program at the University of Toronto, and Zimler-Schiff said they hope to sell at least 1,000 tickets.

In the past FOY has brought the Yiddish Mikado, the Klezmer Conservatory Band and British comedian Bernard Mendelovitch to Toronto.

Zimler-Schiff spoke of the group's partnership with the Bloor Jewish Community Centre in ensuring a Yiddish component in the BJCC's annual Holocaust memorial. She said they help arrange for a Yiddish film to be included in the program of the Toronto Jewish Film Society, and co-sponsor projects at the Workmen's Circle. In addition, FOY members volunteer at Ashkenaz and the Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

"We are looking at a proposal from David Buchbinder to co-sponsor an activity with Askenaz, which has also done a lot to rekindle interest in Yiddish," she said.

Speakers during the dinner included Conversation Club president Bella Sanderson and reports from Study Club chair Evelyn Piltch, vice-president of finance Stan Sanderson, Dos Bletel editor Marvin Schiff and program chair Hermolin. Thanks were expressed to Bess Shockett, executive vice-president, and Ana Berman and Min Grossman for hosting FOY clubs.

The program ended with a story reading by Miriam Beckerman and closing remarks from Roz Lofsky, past president.
